Preface to the Thirteenth edition

Revising an acclaimed celebrated treatise is in itself an honour for any academician, but remains a daunting task accompanied with awe virtually becoming a challenge. An elaboration of the practical importance of transfer of Property, its accompanied rules and regulations becomes unnecessary in today's scenario. Besides the essentiality of having a roof over one's head; usage of landed property for avocation including cultivation makes it one of the indispensable requisite for the society. In addition, in today's materialistic world, tendency of human beings to accumulate wealth and acquisition of real estate visualised as a coveted option for monetary amass and financial security has increased multifold dealings in landed property. For many, real estate; its acquisition facilitating its transfer for personal gains and as a business is the their primary livelihood. Increased demand also augments the probability of enormous squabble. Coupled with increased awareness of legal rules, rights and remedies, notions of entitlements and their perceived denials make people rush to courts for a favourable enforcement adding to already burgeoning case law on this subject. It is therefore not surprising that the last four years have seen a bulk of litigation and rendering of important judicial pronouncements in the arena of transfer of property.

The absence of legislative modifications notwithstanding, these deliberations on several aspects of transfer of property led to clarity in many areas. While an express legislative prohibition on transfer of the suit property by any party to the suit exists, the categorical judicial adjudication pronouncing such transfers as void as against the successful plaintiffs was timely. The inability of such transferees to deprive the successful plaintiff of the fruits of the decree if he purchased the property pendente lite was re-affirmed, as they were held bound by the decree just as much as they were parties to the suit. Courts also observed that a litigating party was exempted from taking notice of a title acquired during the pendency of the litigation even if he was not aware of the status quo. Thus, buyers purchasing suit properties voluntarily, in violation of statutory provisions should not hope for desired relief from the courts as these are exactly the kind of situations section 52 was enacted to prevent. Further, legislative mandate of registration of an agreement to sell, for availing the protection under doctrine of part performance was promulgated seventeen years back, yet in a large number of cases, possession was unsuccessfully sought to be protected under either an oral or an unregistered agreement to sell by the parties. Judicial concern over practical dispossession of a transferee taking possession under a partly performed contract was evident as they permitted a situational specific transferee to be in the shoes of the plaintiff, diluting to some extent the perception of doctrine of part performance as a "shield and not as a sword".

The area of conditions restraining alienation, settlement of property in favour of unborn persons and their conflict with rule against perpetuity, doctrine of feeding the grant by estopple, of lis pendens, sale, mortgage, lease and gifts also involved considerable case law. Distinction between transactions executed by owners and power of attorney holders, claims and counter claims over the nature of mortgage, differentiation between a mortgage by conditional sale or an outright sale without a right of redemption saw further clarification by the judiciary, but a sizeable number of cases related to the transactions under lease agreements.

The differential rules under Muslim personal law relating to procedural formalities in case of gifts and the one statutorily mandated under the Transfer of Property Act, led to adjudication of some interesting issues.

An attempt has been made to maintain the original style of presentation, clarity and critical analysis of both legal provisions and judicial pronouncements in the present edition as well. I cherish a modest hope of its receptivity by the readers.

Preface to the Twelfth Edition

"Property is the condition of good life," says Aristotle. He regards it as an extension of human personality and his view is that property is essential for the satisfaction of a natural instinct of possession and an equally natural impulse of generosity. Even after generations, this view is gaining acceptance. Right to Property is an incentive to effort and induces men to industry and prudence. It should meet the demand of natural justice that man should be entitled to the reward of his labour, and also promote economic growth. The Transfer of Property Act, 1882, evolves on this concept.

The Transfer of Property Act has withstood the test of time for 132 years. In fact after the publication of the 11th edition, there has been no legislative amendment thereto at the central level. In 2013, Registration (Amendment) Bill (Bill No. XLVII of 2013) bringing in changes which would indirectly affect transfer of properties was introduced in the Rajya Sabha, but it has not yet been passed and brought into the statute book. All the same, most of the provisions contemplated therein have been brought into effect in the state of Kerala through the Registration (Kerala Amendment) Act, 2012 (Act 31 of 2013).

That very few amendments were required to the statute over a century indicates the quality of the work that had gone into it. Not that there was no substantial change in the outlook towards property rights. To begin with, right to acquire and hold property was one of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The decision in A.K. Gopalan shook it, leading to a Constitutional amendment. Land reforms legislations in different States also changed the outlook towards holding of property and the rights of lessors and mortgagors and eroded the original provisions in the Transfer of Property Act very fast.

Difficulties of Financial Institutions to recover the dues through enforcement of securities led to the passing of the SARFAESI Act. The coming into force of the IT Act and changes to the Registration Act and Rules also made inroads to the traditional outlook. The application of the provisions in the Transfer of Property Act had to be compromised in view of these modern legislations. The number of decisions rendered by the Supreme Court and High Courts bringing in substantial changes to law of properties after the last edition of the Book were not many. Efforts have been taken to ensure that none of these pronouncements delivered during the interregnum are left out. It is hoped that authenticity of the book will in no way be hampered, if not further improved through this edition.

The project was proposed by Advocate M.A. Rashid to whom I am thankful. In bringing out this book, I was ably assisted by Advocate Boris Paul, an upcoming lawyer of the Kollam Bar, and his effective assistance is appreciated.

Preface to the Eleventh Edition

I have great pleasure in presenting the eleventh edition of Mulla's well known work on the Transfer of Property Act. I must make the frank admission, however, that it has been an extremely daunting task going through an authoritative volume that has already been scrutinized by a number of intelligent brains and sharp eyes. I have remained conscious of this background and have made every effort to remain faithful to the original style and authenticity of the publication while making revisions in the substantive content, and also additions and deletions. The original author's name is potent enough to command respect to such an extent that the work is referable not merely as a book, but as a classic. An association with or a chance to be a part of this volume as a contributor in itself is an honour and at the same time an enormous challenge for the present revising author.

Real estate is an important arena of public life owing to multifarious reasons ranging from high commercial returns and imperative necessity of securing a dwelling house or raising cash on the strength of immovable assets. Similarly, extensive transactions that are totally or partly gratuitous in nature including not merely donations, but akin to relinquishment are also fairly common. Adherence and observance of appropriate legal provisions and principles become inherently necessary to the validity of any such transfer. Property matters are very important in the practical scenario as well, and a tough test for relations and friends, as lust for property, leading to dubious transactions with a view to grabbing the property of innocent and simple people, turns friends into foes and relatives into bitter enemies at times with unfortunate and gruesome consequences. In such a scenario, the settlement of disputes through judicial mechanisms becomes imperative that is evident from a large number of cases making their way to the courts every year. Needless to say that a huge accumulation of judicial pronouncements spreading over six years becomes an added justification for the new edition notwithstanding the immense popularity of the book amongst the legal practitioners, academicians as also the judiciary.

Judicial pronouncements in the last few years have covered the entire enactment, but the highlights were decisions relating to ss. 6(a), 52, 53, 58, 116 and 129. The apex court applied the rules of equity, justice and good conscience and the rules of estoppel even in cases of voluntary and deliberate sale of spes successionis under Muslim law, which as per the literal interpretation of the legislation and the earlier judicial pronouncement was held as un-transferable. It aptly thwarted the attempts of people, who sell spes successionis for considerations analogous to a barter, utilize the consideration and then when the time comes for them to perform their own part of the bargain, resile from doing so, taking the plea under s. 6(a) claiming themselves their inability and incapability to have transferred the spes successionis in the initial place. This evasion of the responsibility under the contract and attempted exploitation of legal provisions amounting to an actual misuse has been noticed and tackled effectively and carefully by the apex court. The impleadment of a transferee pendente lite, where the transfer was affected without taking leave from the court and rather against their order, was refused by the court in light of s. 52. Similarly, despite provisions for mandatory registration, and its requirement in cases of even an agreement to sell under s. 53A as per the 2001 amendment, a contrary but reasoned judgment of the Punjab and Haryana High Court complicates the position. The rules with respect to computation of the limitation period more specifically in cases of usufructary mortgages were reiterated by the apex court in consonance with the legislative provision. The court also clarified the apparent conflict that had developed in the past years over the requirement of registration of a gift deed executed by a Muslim. On one hand the provisions of classical Muslim law permit an individual to gift the property even orally without complying with the formalities of writing, attestation and registration, and on the other hand some high courts had in the past held that where the gift is reduced to writing , then it would have to comply with the requirements under the TP Act, for its validity despite the fact that the law makes it clear that the chapter under the TP Act does not apply to Muslims in so far as it contradicts any provision of classical Muslim law, which clearly means that in cases of conflict, it is the principles of Muslim law that would prevail. The apex court set at rest this conflict by holding that if the gift satisfies the essential requirements of its validity under the classical Muslim law, then the mere fact that it is reduced to writing does not mean that it would have to satisfy the mandatory requirement under the TP Act of registration. Other areas that dominated the five years though without any spectacular development on the judicial side, were ss. 58, 60 and 105-116.

My gratitude and thanks are due to my ever inspiring parents, siblings, my husband Ravinder Saxena and our children Neha and Nipun, without whose encouragement, support and enormous patience, the completion of this work would have remained an impossibility. I sincerely hope that the present edition will find a befitting receptivity and would demonstrate its usefulness as an authority for the judiciary, legal practitioners, academicians, legal researchers and the students.

Preface to the Tenth Edition

The principles statutorily recognised in the Transfer of Property Act are essentially principles of justice, equity and good conscience. These principles underlying the various provisions of the Act particularly relating to mortgage and lease have been applied in areas where otherwise the Act has not been made applicable. The widespread application and effect of the Act and the underlying principles necessitates that the law of transfer of property as declared by the Supreme Court of India under article 141 of the Constitution of India be placed appropriately in a commentary.

In the present edition, law has been updated on the subject since the previous edition. More importantly, an attempt has been made to incorporate and update the Supreme Court decisions. English law and decisions have been suitably placed for tracing the sources of the legal principles which have been statutorily embodied in the Act with appropriate variations, keeping in mind the domesitc need and prevailing customs and practice.

In India, now with the volume of Supreme Court judgments on almost on all the facets of litigation in this area, the law of transfer of property has to a great extent settled and crystalized. With the proper understanding of the law declared by the Supreme Court and the respective high courts and its proper application to the fact situation of a particular case, the adjudicatory process can be made speedy and effective.

The amending Act of 2001 introduced far-reaching changes in section 53A of the Transfer of Property Act and the Registration Act 1908. Now, a registered document signifying transfer of property is a must for the purposes of section 53A. The amending Act of 2002 has substituted section 106. Both the amendments have been duly incorporated.

Most of the cases in the last five years have stemmed out of the provisions relating to lis pendens (s 52), specific performance (s 53A), sale (s 54) mortgage, (ss 58 & 60), lease (ss 105, 106, 108 & 111) and gift (s 122). More than 500 reported cases are available since the previous edition. Important judgments have been delivered by the Supreme Court in the areas of lease, gift. etc. For instance, in K Balakrishnan v K Kamalam the Supreme Court has held that it is open to the donor to transfer by gift, title and ownership in the property and at the same time, reserve lifetime possession and enjoyment to himself. In Laxmidas Bapudas Darbar v Rudravva, principles relating to applicability of rent control legislations to a fixed term lease have been laid down.

The accomplishment of the present work was possible only because of the invaluable research and assistance rendered by my son, Devashish Bharuka despite his busy schedules as a practicing lawyer in the Supreme Court of India. I am thankful to my wife, Dr Hansa Bharuka, who has been by my side throughout extending fullest support and cooperation.

My thanks to the entire team of LexisNexis Butterworths and in particular, Ms Nisha Bopanna and Ms Richa Kachhwaha for their untiring work.

Preface to the Ninth Edition

The present edition aims to cut out the dead wood besides updating the law on the subject. The idea is to make the commentary more relevant to a practising lawyer, while at the same time retaining the academic content and originality of the book.

New caselaw since the last edition has been incorporated within the commentary of the relevant sections; making it much easier for the reader, who does not have to refer to an addendum anymore like in the previous edition. Parts of the commentary that do not hold much relevance today have been deleted so that the book does not accumulate unnecessary bulk. However, utmost care has been taken to retain cases from which the principles have originated.

The most referred sections of the Act like s 53A, ss 105 to 111 have been specially paid attention to. The trend of passing of decrees under o 12, r 6 of the Civil Procedure Code 1908, too has been discussed.

The editor is beholden to a team of young budding lawyers for their invaluable contributions. Avinash Kumar, for sifting through the various law reports to dig out the relevant cases and classifying them; Monica and Anupam Srivastava, who painstakingly went through all the material—the book and the cases—and contributed at every step till the final draft. The book would never have seen the light of the day without them. Last but not the least—to Sushil Chauhan who was always there to provide helpful inputs besides listening to my woes. Dinesh Chopra, the computer operator, deserves special thanks for keeping the time schedule.

Vaibhav Kala, my business partner, deserves a very special thanks for taking the load off my back so that I could work on the book.

Preface to the First Edition

The amendments made in the Transfer of Property Act by the Amending Act 20 of 1929 have set at rest a mass of conflicting decisions, and have in some respects assimilated the law to that enacted in England by the Law of Property Act, 1925.

The changes effected in the law are so numerous that it has been thought desirable to exhibit in a table the plain text of the Act showing in the left hand-column, the sections as they were before the Amending Act and in the right-hand column, the sections as amended.

The commentary is exhaustive in its references to the case law, and attempts to give a concise and a clear explanation of the legal principles underlying each section of the Act.

Whenever a section has been altered by the Amending Act, there is an explanation of what the law was prior to the amendment, and of what the law is subsequent to the amendment.

If a section is based on the English Law that law is stated and the difference, if any, between that law and the Indian law is explained.

The author's acknowledgements are due to AG Touche, Esquire, Barrister-at-Law of Lincoln's Inn, for his valuable assistance in the revision of the proofs with reference to the English law.

The cases cited are from the authorised and unauthorised series upto the end of 1932.

The author also acknowledges gratefully the assistance rendered to him in bringing out this edition by JR Dhurandhar, Esquire, Acting District Judge, District Court, Poona; BK Desai, Esquire, Advocate (OS), High Court, Bombay; KS Shavaksha, Esquire, Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law; KJ Khambatta, Esquire, Advocate (OS), High Court, Bombay; BP Sethna, Esquire, Advocate (OS), High Court, Bombay; MJC Mistree, Esquire, Advocate (OS), High Court, Bombay; BD Mehta, Esquire, Advocate (OS), High Court, Bombay and KDF Mulla, Esquire, Attorney-at-Law, High Court, Bombay.

The author desires to thank the Times of India Press, Bombay for the remarkable despatch in printing the work and for the accuracy throughout the work.

Introduction

Prior to the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, there was practically no law relating to real estate in India. A few points were covered by the Regulations and Acts which were repealed either wholly, or in part by section 2. But for the rest of the law, the courts, in the absence of any statutory provisions, adopted the English law as the rule of justice, equity, and good conscience. This was not satisfactory, for the rules of English law were not always applicable to social conditions in India, and the case law became confused and conflicting. To remedy this state of affairs, Commission was appointed in England to prepare a code of substantive law for India.

The first Law Commission consisted of Lord Romilly, MR; Sir Edward Ryan, Chief Justice of Bengal; Lord Sherbrooke; Sir Robert Lush; and Sir John Macleod, who assisted Lord Macaulay in drafting the Indian Penal Code. This Commission drafted the Indian Succession Act, the Indian Contract Act, the Negotiable Instruments Act, the Indian Evidence Act, and the Transfer of Property Act.

The Transfer of Property Act, though drafted in 1870, was the last of these drafts to become law. The draft was sent to India by the Duke of Argyll who was then Secretary of State for India, and after some amendments, it was first introduced as a Bill in the Legislative Council in 1877. The Bill was then referred to a Select Committee, by whom it was revised and circulated for public criticism. In deference to this criticism, all matters not directly referring to transfers inter vivos were omitted; some clauses referring to trusts, powers and settlements were dropped; and other clauses were added with a view to save the provisions of local law and usage.

The Bill thus redrafted was referred to the Second Law Commission consisting of Sir Charles Turner, Chief Justice of Madras; Sir Raymond West; and Mr Whitley Stokes, Law Member of the Council of the Governor-General; but no less than seven Bills were prepared before the first Bill was introduced in the Legislative Council by Mr Whitley Stokes, and passed into law on 17 February 1882.

The Second Law Commission in their report of 1879 said "the function of the Bill was to strip the English law of all that was local and historical, and to mould the residue into a shape in which it would be suitable for an Indian population and could easily be administered by non-professional judges."

Some of the provisions of the Bill were borrowed from the enactments which it repealed and superseded, but the Bill was based mainly on the English law of real property. The Law of Conveyancing and Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict c 41) had been enacted in England before the Bill was passed into law, and some of the provisions of the Act, notably sections 57, 61 and 69, are borrowed from that statute.

The Act was afterwards amended on 12 separate occasions by the following Amending Acts:

1. Act 3 of 1885—amending sections 1, 4, 6(i), and 69. It abolishes exemptions from the Act on the ground of race, and reconciles the provisions of the Registration Act with those of the Transfer of Property Act.
2. Act 15 of 1895—which exempts government grants from the operation of the Transfer of Property Act.
3. Act 2 of 1990—amending sections 3, 6(e), and 6(h), and remodelling chapter VIII which deals with transfers of actionable claims.

4. Act 6 of 1904—amending sections 1, 59, 69, 107 and 117. It enables a local government to extend part of the Act of specified territories, and to apply the provisions of the Act relating to leases to particular classes of agricultural leases. It provides for the registration of certain mortgages and leases, and for equitable mortgages in moulmein, bassein and akyab.
5. Act 5 of 1908—transferring the adjective law of mortgages to the Code of Civil Procedure.
6. Act 11 of 1915—amending section 69.
7. Act 26 of 1917—validating mortgages and gifts in Agra and Oudh executed before 1 January 1915, and attested on acknowledgement of execution.
8. Act 38 of 1920—omitting the words "with the previous sanction of the Governor-General in council" from sections 1 and 117.
9. Act 38 of 1925—amending section 130.
10. Act 27 of 1926—amending section 3 by inserting a definition of the word "attested"
11. Act 10 of 1927—amending section 3 by making the definition of the word "attested" retrospective.
12. Madras Act 3 of 1922—modifying the provisions of the Act to give effect to the provisions of the Madras City Tenants Protection Act, 1922.

Despite these amendments, there were conflicting decisions on nearly every section of the Act, and a further exposition of the law became necessary. Accordingly in 1927, a Special Committee, consisting of Mr SR Das, Law Member of the Council of the Governor-General, Mr BL Mitter (afterwards Sir Brojendro Lal Mitter), then Advocate-General of Bengal, Dr SN Sen, and Mr Dinshah Mulla (afterwards the Honourable Sir Dinshah Mulla, PC) were appointed to examine the provisions of a Bill prepared by the legislative department of the Government of the India for the purpose of making a general amendment of the Act. The Bill which was the result of their labour was, after a slight amendment in Select Committee, enacted in the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 20 of 1929.

The Act as amended sets at rest points on which decisions have been conflicting, and made several changes in the law, of which the most important are:

Section 3 – Registration amounts to notice.

Section 3 – Constructive notice to an agent is notice to his principal.

Section 15 – Validation of transfers to a class of some members as regards which it fails.

Section 53A – Statutory recognition of the doctrine of part performance.

Section 58 – In a mortgage by conditional sale, the condition must be embodied in the same deed.

Section 60A – A mortgagor entitled to redeem may require the mortgagees to transfer the mortgage debt to a third party.

Section 60B – Statutory recognition of the mortgagor's right of inspection of title deeds.

Section 61 – Mortgagor's right to redeem several mortgages to the same mortgagee separately, or simultaneously.

Section 63A – Statutory recognition of the mortgagee's right to compensation for necessary improvements.

Section 65A – Statutory recognition of the mortgagor's power to lease.

Section 67 – Abolition of the remedy of foreclosure in certain mortgages.

Section 67A – Mortgagee's obligation to enforce several mortgages by the same mortgagor simultaneously.

Section 69A – Provision for appointment of a receiver by a mortgagee exercising a power of sale without the intervention of the court.

Section 92 – An extension of the principle of subrogation.

Section 101 – A modification of the law of merger.

Section 107 – Provision requiring registered leases to be executed by both parties.

The amending Act involved amendments in various other Acts, of which the more important are as follows:

The Married Women's Property Act, 3 of 1874, has been amended to make it clear that section 8 of that Act is subject to section 10 of the Transfer of Property Act.

The Specific Relief Act, 1 of 1877, was amended in accordance with the statutory recognition of the doctrine of part performance in section 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. (The Act was re-enacted in 1963.)

The Code of Civil Procedure, Act 5 of 1908, is amended in O 34 relating to mortgages. Provision is made to allow a mortgagee to recover sums spent for necessary costs, charges and expenses. This is in accordance with section 63A which allows a mortgagee, compensation for improvements in certain circumstances. Mortgages by deposit of title deeds are included in rule 15 of O 34 as such mortgages are included in the definition in section 58, and the old rule 11 is omitted as the principle "redeem up foreclose down" is now embodied in section 94. Other amendments include provisions which make it clear that the right of redemption is not extinguished until a final decree for foreclosure has been made, or until a sale in execution of a mortgage decree has been confirmed.

The Indian Limitation Act, 9 of 1908, was amended by including suits for the enforcement of mortgages by deposit of title deeds in the 12-year period of limitation under Article 132.

The Indian Registration Act, 16 of 1908, was amended to provide that a mortgage by deposit of title deeds, though an oral transaction, cannot be displaced by a subsequently registered instrument; and also to allow an unregistered instrument to be admitted as evidence of part performance of a contract with reference to section 53A of the Transfer of Property Act.

The Indian Succession Act, 39 of 1925, was amended to correspond with amendments made in chapter II of the Transfer of Property Act with reference to transfers inter vivos.

All these amendments were made by a separate Act, the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplementary Act 21 of 1929.

Further amending Acts were passed after the legislation of 1929. Act 5 of 1930 amends explanation I to section 3 with reference to the operation of registration of a deed of notice when the deed is registered in a different district; and Act 16 of 1930 amends O 43, rule 1(o) of the Code of Civil Procedure in accordance with the amendments made in O 34, and Act 35 of 1934 inserts the word "naval" after the word "military" in clause (g) of section 6.

There have been few major changes since 1947. In that year, the Disposition of Property (Bombay) Validation Act, 1947, was passed to validate the bequests held void by the Privy Council in Sopher's case.

After 1947, the jurisdiction of the Privy Council was abolished, and the Federal Court and later the Supreme Court became the final court of adjudication in India.

Successive adaptation of orders in 1950 and 1956 have nominally altered the Act by, for example, altering the words "Province", "British India", "Part B State", etc.

In 1959, Parliament enacted the Miscellaneous Personal Laws (Extension) Act, 1959, which extended the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 1916, to the whole of India except Jammu & Kashmir, and Madras Acts I of 1914 and 8 of 1921 were repealed.

The Limitation Act, 1963, has repealed and largely re-enacted the Act of 1908. Among the few changes relevant here is the new Article 63 (a), which provides for a period of 30 years for all suits for foreclosure; and the absence of a provision corresponding to the old Article 116, which provided for a period of six years for compensation for the breach of a contract that is registered. All such suits would now be treated on the same footing, irrespective of whether the contract is registered.

1963 also saw the enactment of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, which repeals and partly re-enacts the Act of 1977. Section 27A of the Act of 1877 which enacted the active equity of part performance as in English Law has not however, been re-enacted.

Benami Transaction (Prohibition) Act, 1988, takes away the plea of Benami purchase, and has made the litigation and transactions under the Transfer of Property Act, much simpler.

By Registration and other Related Laws (Amendment) Act, 2001 (Act 48 of 2001) which came into force from 24 September 2001, far reaching amendments have been made to the Registration Act, 1908, and section 53A of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. On or after the commencement of the amending Act, if the document containing contract to transfer for consideration any immovable property is not registered, then, for the purpose of section 53A, the right to defend possession pursuant to part-performance will not be available.

The Parliament, by Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 2002 (Act 3 of 2002) which came into force on 31 December 2002, has substituted section 106 in order to eliminate the technical pleas so far taken on the basis of the language employed in unamended section 106, and avoid multiplicity of litigation leading to serious injustice. The transitory provisions made under the amending Act are very material since the provisions contained in amended section 106 have been made applicable even to the suits or proceedings pending at the commencement of the amending Act.

Ex-proprietary tenant.–A landlord or proprietor who has lost his proprietary rights by alienation voluntary or involuntary and has become a tenant with a right of occupancy in his sit land and in land which he has cultivated continuously for a specified number of years.See The Oudh Rent Act 1886 (UP Act 22 of 1886) s 7 A; The Agra Tenancy Act 1926, (UP Act 3 of 1926) s 14; The North West Provinces Tenancy Act 1901, (NWP Act of 1901) s 10. See also 'Sir.'

Ex-proprietary tenant.–An ex-proprietary tenant is a landlord who has lost his proprietary right but who remains a tenant with a right of occupancy of his sir or home farm land; See The Agra Tenancy Act, UP Act 3 of 1926, ss 14 & 15; The North-West Provinces Tenancy Act, NWP Act 2 of 1901, s 10. See also 'Sir'.

Fee Simple.–A term of English real property law denoting an absolute estate. 'Fee signifieth inheritance and simple is added for that is descendible to his heirs generally that is simply without restraint to the heirs of the body or the like. The word (simple) properly excludeth both conditions and limitations that defeat or abridge the fee' (Co Litt 1 b: Halsb Vol 24, para 315).

Fee Tail.–A term of English real property law denoting a restricted estate or feudum talliatum or an estate tail. 'To hold in fee Tail or in Tail is where a man holdeth certain lands or tenements to him and to his heirs of his body begotten.' (Terms de la Ley; Halsb Vol 24, para 442.)

Feoffment.–A term of English real property law denoting a conveyance in fee simple.

Forehand rent.–Rent payable in advance.

Gahan.–(Marathi). A pledge. A mortgage.

Gahan Lahan.–(Marathi). A mortgage by conditional sale.

Ghatwal.–Literally the guard of the ghat or hill pass. Ghatwal lands were holding created in frontier territories so that the holders might be 'wardens of the Marches. the State granting lands to be held free on condition of guarding the passes: Baden Powell Land Systems of British India, Vol I, p 532. The person holding the office of ghatwal is bound to perform police duties and quasi military duties in consideration of a remuneration which may take the form of the use of land or an actual estate in land, heritable and perpetual: Narayan Singh v Niranjan Chakravarti (1924) 51 IA 37, 3 Pat 183, 79.1C 825, AIR 1924 PC 5. The tenure, though peculiar because of a certain reserved power of selection, nevertheless ranks as hereditary: Raja Durga Prasad v Tribeni (1918) 45 LA 251, 46 Cal 362: Secretary of State vJyoti Prasad (1926) 53 IA 100, 53 Cal 533, 94 IC 974, AIR 1926 PC 41. The Birbhum yhatwallands were declared transferable and heritable subject to a rent fixed in perpetuity by Beng Reg 29 of 1814.

Gross.–A thing or right in gross is one which is independent of anything else. Thus a right or common of pasture appendant may exist in respect of arable land: Tyrringham's case (1584) 4 Co Rep 36a, 37. But a right or common of pasture in gross appertaineth to no land and must be in writing or prescription: Co Litt 122a.

Guzara.–From the Persian word Guzarish. Maintenance.

Hat.–A market, a market held on certain days, a fair.

Hathchitti.–A letter or note written or vouched by the hand of.

Havala.–A transfer of a debt from the original debtor to a person who becomes liable for it to the creditor.

Hereditament.–A term of English real property law. The word hereditament is of as large extent as any word, for whatever may be inherited, be it corporeal or incorporeal, real personal or mixt, is a hereditament: Co Litt 16a, 383a, b.— Tenement is a large word to grant realty but hereditament is the largest: Coke Inst, Vol 1, p 6 Jarman says that the most comprehensive words of description applicable to real estate are tenements and hereditaments as they include every species of realty corporeal as well as incorporeal.

Heriot.–A term of English real property law denoting the right of the Lord of the manor, on the death of a freeholder to the best beast or other chattel of such freeholder: Halsb, 2nd Ed vol 7, para 574.

Habi-bil-iwaz.–A gift with an exchange. A mutual gift. A gift for a consideration as when a man gives property to his wife in lieu of her dower.

Homestead land.–In Bengal, the expression denotes a permanent tenancy created before the Transfer of Property Act for the purpose of habitation when a pucca building has been erected of the land leased: Safar Ali v Abdul Rasid (1924) 39 Cal LJ 585. With reference to the Bombay Bhagdari Act (Born Act 5 of 1862), a homestead has been defined as including the site of the building, the dwelling house; the trees, wells and shrine and all the appendages which together constitute the usual surroundings of the ordinary village home: Collector of Broach v Venilal (1897) ILR 21 Bom 588, p 593.

Id certum est quod certum fieri potest–(Latin). Another reading is 'Id certum est quod certum reddi potest.' That is (sufficiently) certain which can be made certain. A maxim of construction: Owen v Thomas (1834) 3 My and K 353 (a contract): Adams v Jones (1852) 9 Hare 485 (a will).

In esse.–(Latin). In being.

In gremio.–(Latin). In the bosom of.

In odium spoliatoris.–(Latin), The whole maxim is 'In odium spoliatoris omnia praesumuntur', Every presumption is made against a wrongdoer. A rule of evidence that as between an innocent party and a wrongdoer unexplained circumstances are presumed unfavourably to the wrongdoer: Halb, 2nd Ed, Vol 13, para 705.

In pari delicto potiorest conditio possidentis.–(Latin). In equal fault, the condition of the possessor is the stronger.

Inam.–An Arabic word meaning a gift or benefaction. A gift by a superior to an inferior. The term is applied to gifts of land rent free or at a quit rent in hereditary and permanent occupation. There are many classes of inam, but the word is of generic significance applicable to the grant as a whole.

Inter vivos.–(Latin). Between living persons,

Istimrari.–From the Arabic word Istimrar meaning perpetual. Permanent. Perpetual. The word may by usage refer to perpetuity during the lifetime of the grantee. See Istimrari Mokaniri. In the absence of such usage, an istimarari lease was held to convey a permanent and hereditary right: Din Dayal v Sifat Ali (1923) 10 OLJ 630. The istimarari estates in Ajmere are held in absolute proprietary right and only pay revenue to the government in the form of a permanent and unenhanceable tribute: Baden Powell Land Systems of British India, Vol II, p 336.

Istimrari Mokarari.–From the Arabic word Istimrar meaning perpetual in point of time, and the Arabic word Mokarar meaning fixed as to rent. A perpetual tenure at a fixed rent. But the words in their lexicographical sense do not imply any heritable character as mourasi does: Narsingh Dyal v Ram Narain (1903) ILR 30 Cal 883 approved in Kamakhya v Rama Raksha 55 IA 212, 109 IC 663, AIR 1928 PC 146. This is because permanence may only be during the lifetime of the grantee and the words by themselves only confer a life estate on the grantee: Ramnarain Singh v Chota Nagpur Banking Association (1916) ILR 43 Cal 332, 36 IC 321

Jaghir.–From the Persian word Jai meaning a place, and the Persian word Gir meaning a holder. A grant generally from the Moghul Government of the royal share of the revenue but not of the soil. Such grants were originally for life to a Court favourile or as an appanage to an officer or title and were resumable at pleasure. In time, either because of the decline of the Central Government or because it was thought below the dignity of the ruler to resume, the grant became permanent and hereditary and many assignments to revenue grew into landlord tenures. Again jaghir grants were sometimes made with the express object of settling waste lands so that the terms of the grant were such as to make the estate hereditary and alienable. Baden Powell Land Systems of British India, Vol I, p 189: Ramakrishnarao v Nanrao (1903) 5 Bom LR 983; Maya Das v Gurdit Singh 16 IC 855. See Gulabdas v The Collector of Surat 6 IA 54.

Kamaki.–Waste land adjoining cultivated land. The adjoining ryot has certain rights called kamaki rights over the waste land, eg, the right of pasturage and of gathering leaves for manure.

Kanam.–A customary mortgage in Madras which partakes of the character of a mortgage and of a lease. It cannot be redeemed before 12 years and the mortgagor lessee or kanamdar is entitled to compensation for improvements on redemption. The annual payments to the mortgagor-lessor or janmi (probably a corruption of zemindar) are regulated by what remains of the fixed share of the produce after deducting interest. If the mortgage is nor redeemed, but is renewed at the expiry of 12 years, a renewal fee is payable to the janmi. This mortgage has a feudal origin, the mortgage debt having been originally a fee paid in token of feudal allegiance by the holder of the land to the lord: Baden Powell, Land Systems of British India; Vol III, pp 159-177. See Ayyappan v Venkedeswam (1962) ILR 2 Ker 614, AIR 1963 Ker 309. Kanam was defined in the Malabar Tenancy Act, Mad Act 14 of 1930, s 3(1), as follows:—

'Kanam means the transfer of consideration in money or in kind or in both by a landlord of an interest in specific immoveable property to another (called the kanamdar) for the latter's enjoyment, the incidents of which include:—

(1) a right in the transferee to hold the said property liable for the consideration paid by him or due to him which consideration is called 'kanartham',

(2) the liability of the transferor to pay to the transferee interest on the kanartham,

(3) the payment of 'michavaram' by the transferee,

(4) the right of the transferee to enjoy the said property for twelve years or any other period, and

(5) the liability of the transferee to pay a renewal fee to the transferor, if the transferee is permitted to enjoy the said property for a further period after the termination of the original period.'

The word 'michavaram' in the above definition is defined in s 3(q) of the said Act as 'whatever is agreed by a kanamdar in a kanam deed to be paid periodically in money or in kind or in both, to or on behalf of the janmi., Section 17 of the said, Act, gives the kanamdar a right of renewal and regulates the renewal fee.

Kanamdar.–See Kanam.

Karnam.–A village servant employed in revenue duties in Madras, and corresponding to a patwari in Northern Indian and kulkerni in Western India. Scheduled distriet.–A scheduled district is defined in s 3 (49) of the General Clauses Act to be a scheduled district as defined in the Scheduled Districts Act 1874. The Indian Statute Book contained from the earliest time 'deregulationizing' enactments barring the application of the ordinary law, which was at first contained in the old 'regulations' in the more backward ad less civilised parts of the country. These enactments became so complicated that it was difficult to ascertain what laws were and what laws were not in force in the 'deregulationized' tracts. The Scheduled Districts Act was passed to remove doubts as to the extent of these tracts and the law in force therein. It specifies and constitutes a number of the deregulationized tracts as scheduled districts and gives power to declare by notification what enactments are, and what enactments are not in force in any scheduled district. It further enacts that any district to which 33 Vict c 3 s 1 (giving power to make regulations for the peace and good government of British India) is made applicable, is a scheduled district. - Illbert's Government of India, p 214.

Seisin.–A term of English real property law. Sir.–The world means 'his own'-The proprietor's Sir land is his own land as distinguished from the land in which the old tenants of the village have ancient rights. It is the home farm land in which the landlord or co-sharer in the joint village holds directly in his own management, either cultivating it himself or by his farm servants of personal tenants. Certain privileges attach to the Sir and if the landlord or sharer defaults in the payment of revenue and is put out of possession and becomes an ex-proprietary tenant, he still retains his Sir: Baden Powell Land Systems of British India, Vol 1, p 166. See also the Agra Tenancy Act, UP Act 3 of 1926, ss 4-7, 14, 15, 18 and 69; The Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, CP Act 2 of 1917, ss 2(17), 68, 93, 9,106, 120 and 137: The North-Western Province Tenancy Act, N-WP Act 2 of 1901, ss 10, 11 and 89; The North-Western Provinces and Oudh Land Revenue Act, N-WP Act 3 of 1901, ss 4(2), 4(l3), 122 to 127.

Specialty.–A contract under seal. A contract made by deed, eg, a mortgage.

Spes successionis.–(Latin). An expectancy to succeed to the property of a living person. It confers no actual interest in property, not even a contingent interest.

Stridhan.–Property held by a Hindu woman unconditionally and subject to no restriction. That alone is her peculiar property which she has power to give, sell or use independently of her husband's control: Phukar Singh v Rangit Singh (1878) 1 All 661.

Sudbharnabond.–From Sud, interest, and Bharna, paying in full. A usufructuary mortgage bond.

Suijuris.–(Latin). Literally, of his own right. A person capable of exercising his rights. An adult who is no-longer under the disability of infancy.

Suo jure.–(Latin). In one's own right.

Swadhin Adhamanam.–Literally possession deed. A possessory mortgage in Malabar.

Tabula in naufragio.–(Latin) Literally a raft in a shipwreck. A description applied to the English doctrine of tacking.

Tagavi or Takavi.–Literally assisting. Advances of money made by the Government to cultivators for the purchase of seed to be repaid when the crop is reaped.

Tahsildar.–An official in charge of the collection of the revenue of a tahsil or division of a district.

Thluka or Talook.–A division of a district. An estate. Talukas in Oudh were originally granted by the Moghul Government at a favourable assessment. See The Oudh Estates Act 1 of 1869 as amended by Act 3 of 1885. As to Gujarat see Bom Act 6 of 1888. As to Pami Talukas see 'Patni.'

Talukdar.–The holder of a taluka. See 'Taluka.'

Taran Gahan.–Literally security pledge. A simple mortgage in Bombay.

Tarward.–A term of Malabar law denoting a group of persons all of them tracing their descent from a common female ancestor, owning joint property under the absolute management and, control of the senior male member who is; alled the karnavan: Shuppu Menon v Narayanan (1905) ILR 28 Mad 182 (FB).

Tenant by curtesy.–'A tenant by curtesy of England is where a man taketh a wife seised in free simple or in fee tail general or seised as heir in tail general, and hath issue by the same wife, male or female, born alive albeit the issue after dieth or liveth yet if the wife, dies the husband shall hold the land during his life by the law of England - Coke on Littleton s 35 cited in Eager v Furnivall (1881) 17 Ch D 115, 120. - The husband was said to have an estate by curtesy meaning probably an estate given by the curia or court. The estate of courtesy has been abolished by the Admini istration of Estates Act 1925.

Tenement.–A term of English real property law. Blackstone says that a tenement though in its vulgar acceptation is only applied to houses and other buildings, yet in its original, proper and legal sense, it signifies everything that may be holden provided it be of a permanent nature.

Terminus a quo.–(Latin). The starting point from which.

Toda giras hak.–The right to an annual payment of toda giras. The custom of toda giras arose out of the dispossession by conquest of old Rajput Chiefs in Malwa, Gujarat and Central India. They were cadets of ruling Rajput families to whom territory had been assigned for giras or maintenance, the word Giras meaning literally a mouthful. When dispossessed they waged war and levied contribution all around them. Their exactions were compromised, the word Toda meaning a composition. Toda giras was, therefore, in its origin, a cash composition which secured protection and freedom from plunder. The allowance has now become an item in the rent roll of the villages: Baden Powell Land System of British India - Vol 3, pp 277, 281.

Transit in rem judicatum.–(Latin). Passes into or becomes a thing adjudged or finally decided. When the judgment is delivered the cause of action is extinguished and transit in rem judicatam or merges in the judgment.

Ulavadi.–(Tamil). A cultivator who has inherited land. A ulavadi mirasdar was held not to be a permanent tenant when he was also described as paracudi, ie, migratory: Mayandi Chettyar v Chokkalingam (1904) ILR 27 Mad 291, 31 IA 83.

Uraller.–The trustee or manager of a temple in Malabar.

Utbandi.–A system of cultivation in Bengal by which the tenant cultivates for a year or a season only and the rent is fixed by agreement when the crop is on the ground. Hunter's Statistical Account of Bengal cited in Beni Madhub v Bhuban Mohun (1891) ILR 17 Cal 393.

Ut lite pendente nihil innovetur.–(Latin). Let nothing be altered or renewed while the suit is pending.

Utpat.–A priest attached to the temple at Pandharpur.

Ut res magis valeat quam pereat.–(Latin). Literally rather let the matter prevail than let it perish or rather let it operate than let it be inefficient. A canon of construction, whereby, if a deed is capable of a twofold construction, that construction should be adopted which will uphold the deed.

Varashasan.–(Marathi). An annual allowance paid either by the Treasury or by assignment of the revenues of a village; and assignment or charge on the revenues of a village made by the proprietor.

Verumpattamdar.–A verumpattam tenant. See Verumpattam tenant.

Verumpattam tenant.–A tenant who has taken a lease for the cultivation of land or gardens without any loan or advance. See The Malabar Tenancy Act, Act 14 of 1930 s 3(w).

Vinaya.–A code of ecclesiastical law following the precepts of Buddha and recite by Buddh's, disciple Upali at the first Council ater Buddha's death. Rules of discipline for the monastic order.

Vritti.–A Sanskrit word meaning maintenance, means of livelihood or profession. A customary allowance; a payment or a fee to a Brahmin.

Wakf.–The word in Arabic means literally 'detention' or 'immobilisation'. Hence Baillie's definition–'The detention of a thing in the implied ownership of Almighty God in such a manner that its profits may revert to or be applied for the benefit of mankind' Baillie's Mahomedan Law p 558. Hamilton translates the word as appropriation. Hence the definition –'The appropriation of any particular article in such a manner as subjects it to the rules of divine property whence the appropriators right to it is extinguished and it becomes the property of God by the advantages resulting to his creatures.' Hamilton's Hedayapp 231. The definition in the Wakf Act is 'Wakf means the permanent dedication by a person professing the Mussalman law as religious, pious or charitable.' This represents the meaning now attached to the word in the courts.

Wajib-ul-arz.–(Arabic). Literally fit or worthy of representation. A record of rights prepared by a Settlement Officer in a co-parcenary village. In the North-West Provinces, it is the most important document relating to the administration of the village: Mussammat Lali v Murli Dhar 33 IA 97. It is a register of the shares and holdings in the village and states, the mode of payment of the revenue and the powers and privileges of the Lambardars. it is also an official record of local custom: Balgobin v Badri Prasad 50 IA 196.

Watan.–The word includes an office held hereditarily for the performance-of duties connected with the administration or collection of the public revenue or with village police. The Watan property, if any. the hereditary office, and the rights and priovileges attached to them together constitute the Watan. Watan land is land held or assigned for providing remuneration for the performance of the duties of the watandar or person holding the hereditary office. See Bom, Act 3 of 1874.

Yajman.–A person who employs a priest or priests to perform for him either fixed or occasional religious ceremonies; a: householder; a head of a family; a master or head of a caste.

Yajmari Vahis.–Books containing names of pilgrims who have visited the shrine in past years.

Yajman virtti.–An obligation imposed upon the purohit or family priest to perform certain religious rites, the performance of which carries with it certain emoluments: Kadulal v Beharilal (1932) 25 SLR 451,137 IC 136.

Zarichaharam.–A fourth part of the price; claimed by the zemindar as a perquisite on the sale of a holding.

Zur-i'peshgi.–Literally a payment in advance or a lease for a premium. A usufructuary mortgage in the form of a lease.

An Act to amend the law relating to the Transfer of Property by act of parties.

Preamble.—WHEREAS it is expedient to define and amend certain parts of the law relating to the transfer of property by act of parties; it is hereby enacted as follows:—

The true place of a preamble in a statute was at one time the subject of conflicting decisions. The modern rule is that where the enacting part is explicit and unambiguous, the preamble cannot be resorted to, to control, qualify or restrict it; but where the enacting part is ambiguous, the preamble can be referred to, to explain and elucidate it. This rule has been applied to Indian statutes by the Privy Council,[1] and also by the Supreme Court of India.[2] The substantive provision of the enactment is to be approached in the light of the policy and purpose deducible from the terms of the long title and the preamble, says the Supreme Court of India.[3]

(1) Define and Amend

The Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (TP Act) was intended to define and amend the existing law, and not to introduce any new principle.[4] It embodies principles of equity, justice and good conscience.[5] The chief objects of TP Act were initially to bring the rules which regulate the transmission of property between living persons into harmony with the rules affecting its devolution on death and thus, to furnish and complement the work commenced in framing the law of testamentary and intestate succession; and secondly, to complete the code of contract law so far as it relates to immovable property.[6]

(2) Act not Exhaustive

The Act is not exhaustive, and it does not profess to be a complete code.[7] This is apparent from the omission of the word "consolidate", which occurs, for instance, in the preamble to the Indian Evidence Act, 1872.[8] The preamble to the Indian Contract Act, 1872 is worded in terms similar to the preamble of TP Act.[9] In Irrawaddi Flotilla Co v Bhugwandas,[10] which was a case under the Contract Act, the Privy Council observed that the said Act did not profess to be a complete code dealing with the law relating to contracts, that is purported to do no more than to define and amend certain parts of that law, and that the legislature did not intend to deal exhaustively with the law relating to contracts. The facts stated in the Preamble and the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to any legislation are evidence of legislative judgment. They indicate the thought process of the elected representatives of the people and their cognizance of the prevalent state of affairs, impelling them to enact the law. These, therefore constitute important factors which amongst others will be taken into consideration by the Court in judging the reasonableness of any restriction imposed on the Fundamental Rights of the individuals.[11] The Privy Council[12] through the words of Lord Atkin had declared that "when the meaning of the words is plain, it is not the duty of the courts to busy themselves with supposed intentions". This principle was adhered by Supreme Court of India which also stated that the law has been consistent ever since then.[13]

(3) Legislative Competence

Both the Parliament and the state legislature have the power to make laws with respect to "Transfer of Property other than agricultural land", which matter is included in entry 6 of the concurrent list in the seventh schedule to the Constitution. Legislation relating to the relationship of landlord and tenant, including rent control with respect to non-agricultural land, will come under entry 6 of list III.[14] The subject of transfer of agricultural land is covered by entry 18 of the state list. A State law relating to the transfer of agricultural land may override the provisions of the TP Act, for instance, as to mortgages of agricultural land.[15] Transfer of agricultural land, whether belonging to scheduled tribes or other persons, would come under entry 18 of list II, which carries with it not only a power to make a law placing restrictions on transfers and alienations of such land including a prohibition thereof, but also the power to make a law to re-open such transfers and alienations.[16] The Supreme Court has held that the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupants) Act, 1971 in so far it deals with a licencee of premises other than premises belonging to the Central Government, falls in entries 6, 7 and 46 of list III.[17] Likewise, Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act, 1988, is not an enactment relating to the transfer of property, but is a law relating to trusts and trustees and, therefore, cannot be related to the legislative head "Transfer of Property" in entry 6 of list III.[18]

(4) By Act of Parties

The Supreme Court, in the case of Bharat Petroleum Corporation Ltd v P Kesavan,[19] has held:

> As would appear from the preamble of the Transfer of Property Act, the same applies only to transfer by act of parties. A transfer by operation of law is not validated or invalidated by anything contained in the Act. A transfer which takes place by operation of law, therefore, need not meet the requirement of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act or the Indian Registration Act.

These words exclude transfer by operation of law, ie, by sale in execution,[20] forfeiture, insolvency or intestate succession. It also limits the scope of the Act to transfers inter vivos, and excludes testamentary succession.[21]

(5) By Operation of Law

The principles embodied in some of the provisions have been applied to transfers by the operation of law in some cases.[22]

(6) Rules of Interpretation of Statutes

Before discussing the provisions of the TP Act in detail, it is advisable to state the principal rules for the interpretation of statutes:

(1) A cardinal rule of interpretation of statutes, which is often referred to as the golden rule is that the grammatical sense of the words used should be adhered to, technical words being construed according to their technical meaning, and other words in their most ordinary and popular acceptation.[23]

(2) It is a sound rule of interpretation to take the words of a statute as they stand and to interpret them ordinarily, but when it is contended that the legislature intended by any particular amendment to make substantial changes in the pre-existing law, it is impossible to arrive at a conclusion without considering what the law was prior to the particular enactment, and to see whether the words used in the statue can be taken to effect the change that is suggested as intended.[24]

(3) If the meaning is clear, the court is not at liberty to look at the presumed intention of the legislature. The question for the court is not what the legislature meant, but what language of the Act means. In Salomon v Salomon & Co,[25] Lord Watson said:

> Intention of the Legislature is a common but a very slippery phrase, which properly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the Legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a court of law or Equity what the Legislature intended to be done, or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication.

(4) When the literal construction would lead to some absurdity, repugnance or inconsistency, the grammatical sense may be modified so as to avoid that difficulty but no further,[26] but it is a well-known rule that a casus omissus cannot be supplied by a court of law.[27]

(5) The literal construction ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the legislature as apparent from the statute, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction by which that intention will be better effectuated.[28]

(6) The construction should be as far as possible beneficial, ie, to suppress mischief and advance the remedy, if this can be done without violence to the language of the section.[29]

(7) A general Act must not be construed so as to derogate from a special Act.[30] The general maxim is generalia specialibus non derogant. When the legislature has given its attention to a separate subject and made provision for it, the presumption is that a subsequent general enactment is not intended to interfere with the special provision, unless it manifests that intention very clearly. Each enactment must be construed in that respect according to its own subject-matter and its own terms.[31]

(8) Statutes encroaching upon private rights must be strictly construed so as to save those rights as far as possible.[32] An intention to take away property without compensation should not be imputed to a legislature, unless it be expressed in unequivocal terms.[33]

(9) Statutes affecting substantive law or vested rights are not retrospective, unless expressed to be so; but statutes affecting procedure may properly have retrospective effect attributed to them, unless that construction be textually inadmissible.[34] The principles affecting the retrospective operation of statutes have been stated as follows:[35]

(a) Legislative enactments have no retrospective effect, unless explicitly stated to be so in the enactments themselves.

(b) Amending statutes should not be construed as having retrospective effect, if they affect vested rights.

(c) Statutes which are declaratory or explanatory are to be construed as having retrospective effect as they give an authoritative explanation of the words, phrases or clauses used in a statute, and whenever the statute has to be applied the explanation also should be applied.

(d) No recital in a declaratory or amending statute can render void that which has been declared by the courts to have been rightly done under the law.

(e) Statutes which affect a mere procedure are retrospective in their nature.

The TP Act, however, expressly enacts in section 2(c) that it is not retrospective.

The retrospective operation of changes introduced by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1929, has been fully considered by the Full Bench of the Patna High Court with reference to section 92 of the TP Act.[36]

(10) Proceedings of the legislative council are excluded from consideration in the judicial construction of an Act. The debates in the legislative council reports of Select Committees and statements of objects and reasons annexed to a Bill may not be referred to.[37] The Supreme Court has held that though the statement of objects and reasons cannot be taken into account for the purpose of interpreting the words of the section, it gives an indication of what the legislature wanted to achieve.[38]

(11) Headings of sections or groups of sections in the Act have the effect of preambles to those sections, and may be referred to as an aid to construction.[39]

(12) Marginal notes to the sections are not to be referred to for the purpose of construction. The Supreme Court has held that a marginal note cannot be invoked for construction where the meaning is clear.[40]

(13) Illustrations are instances of the practical application of the written law without which law would amount to nothing.[41] Since they explain the meaning of the section, they are useful as aids to construction, but they cannot control the plain meaning of the section.[42] The great usefulness of the illustrations which have, although not part of the sections, been expressly furnished by the legislature as helpful in the working and application of the statute, should not be impaired. The Supreme Court holds the same view.[43]

(14) "It is an error to rely upon punctuation in construing Acts of the Legislature."[44]

(15) Provisos to sections have the effect of excepting out of the preceding portion, or of qualifying it; a proviso cannot be construed as enlarging the scope of the enactment.[45] It is well-settled that the proviso and the portion of the section must be construed as a whole, each portion throwing light, if need be, on the rest.[46]

Once the Legislature has defined a term in the interpretation clause, it is not necessary for it to use the same expression in other provisions of the Act. It is well settled that the meaning assigned to a term as defined in the interpretation clause unless the context otherwise requires should be given the same meaning.[47] If two special enactments contain provisions which give overriding effect to the provisions contained therein, then the Court is required to consider the purpose and the policy underlying the two Acts and the clear intendment conveyed by the language of the relevant provisions.[48]

Preliminary

Sections 1–4, Transfer of Property Act, 1882

1. Short Title.—This Act may be called the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Commencement.—It shall come into force on the first day of July, 1882.

Extent.—[1][It extends[2] in the first instance to the whole of India except [3][the territories which, immediately before the 1st November, 1956, were comprised in Part B States or in the States of Bombay, Punjab and Delhi.]

[4][But this Act or any part thereof may by notification in the Official Gazette be extended to the whole or any part of the [5][said territories] by the [6][State Government] concerned].

[7][And any [8][State Government may [9][] from time to time, by notification in the Official Gazette, exempt, either retrospectively or prospectively, any

1. Subs. by the A.O. 1950, for the original third paragraph.
2. The application of this Act was barred in the Naga Hills District, including the Mokokchang Sub-Division, the Dibrugarh Frontier Tract, the North Cachar Hills, the Garo Hills, the Khasea and Jaintia Hills and the Mikir Hills Tract, by notification under sec. 2 of the Assam Frontier Tracts Regulation, 1880 (2 of 1880). The Act has been declared to be in force in Panth Piploda by the Panth Piploda Laws Regulation, 1929 (1 of 1929), sec. 2, and continued in force, with modifications, in the territory transferred to Delhi Province by the Delhi Laws Act, 1915 (7 of 1915), sec. 3 and Sch. III. It has also been partially extended to Berar by the Berar Laws Act, 1941 (4 of 1941). The Act has been extended with effect from 1st January, 1893, to the whole of the territories, other than the Scheduled Districts, under the administration of the Govt. of Bombay. Sections 54, 107 and 123 have been extended from 6th May, 1925 to all Municipalities in the Punjab and to all notified areas declared and notified under sec. 241 of the Punjab Municipal Act, 1911 (Pun. Act 3 of 1911), see Punjab Gazette, Extra., 1925, p. 27. These sections and section 129 have been extended to certain areas in Delhi Province, see Notifications No. 198/38-III, dated 30th May, 1939, Gazette of India, 1939, Pt. I, p. 918, and No. 61/40-Judl., dated 16th November, 1940, Gazette of India, 1940, Pt. I, p. 1639, respectively. The Act has been extended to Manipur by the Union Territories (Laws) Amendment Act, 1956 (68 of 1956). It has been rep. as to Government Grants by the Government Grants Act, 1895 (15 of 1895) and rep. or modified to the extent necessary to give effect to the provisions of the Madras City Tenants Protection Act, 1921 (Madras 3 of 1921) in the City of Madras; see sec. 13 of that Act. It has been amended in Bombay by Bombay Act 14 of 1939, and in Uttar Pradesh by Uttar Pradesh Act 24 of 1954. It has been extended to Pondicherry by Act 26 of 1968, sec. 3, Sch., Part I.

part of the territories administered by such State Government from all or any of the following provisions, namely:—

Sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, 59, 107 and 123.]

[10]Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing part of this section, sections 54, paragraphs 2 and 3, and sections 59, 107 and 123 shall not extend or be extended to any district or tract of country for the time being excluded from the operation of the Indian Registration Act, [11][1908] (16 of 1908) under the power conferred by the first section of that Act or otherwise.]

Synopsis

(1) Amendment 8
(2) Power of State Government 8
(3) Application of Provisions of Act, where Act does not Apply, as Rules of Justice, Equity and Good Conscience 8

(1) Amendment

The only change made by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 20 of 1929, is to change the year of Registration Act from 1877 to 1908.

(2) Power of State Government

The Privy Council in Empress v Burah[12] upheld the validity of the power conferred on the provincial governments to vary the extent of the TP Act. Subsequent to the enactment of the Constitution the Supreme Court has held that such a power is valid, but the state government or the executive cannot modify the TP Act. As a part of an Act can be extended by an executive authority, it follows that a section or sections also can be picked out and applied.[13]

Though Article 162 of the Constitution extends the executive power of a state to the matters with respect to which the legislature of the state has power to make laws, yet, neither the Central Government, nor state government can exercise its executive powers in relation to the aspects of transfer of property which are covered by the TP Act.[14]

(3) Application of Provisions of Act, where Act does not Apply, as Rules of Justice, Equity and Good Conscience

The Himachal Pradesh High Court has held that in the territories where the T P Act was not in force, the courts can rely upon the various provisions of the TP Act for guidance, if such provisions are in consonance with principles of justice, equity and good conscience.[15] However, this rule may not apply to provisions which embody technical rules.[16]

2. Repeal of Acts.—Saving of certain enactments, incidents, rights, liabilities, etc.—In the territories to which this Act extends for the time being the enactments specified in the Schedule hereto annexed shall be repealed to the extent therein mentioned. But nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect—

(a) the provisions of any enactment not hereby expressly repealed;

(b) any terms or incidents of any contract or constitution of property which are consistent with the provisions of this Act, and are allowed by the law for the time being in force;

(c) any right or liability arising out of a legal relation constituted before this Act comes into force, or any relief in respect of any such right or liability; or

(d) save as provided by section 57 and chapter IV of this Act, any transfer by operation of law or by, or in execution of, a decree or order of a Court of competent jurisdiction; and nothing in the second Chapter of this Act shall be deemed to affect any rule of [17][] Muhammadan [18][] law.

(2) Nothing herein Contained

These words refer to the whole Act, and not to this section only.[19]

(3) Clause (a)—Enactments not Expressly Repealed

The TP Act does not apply to patnis which are governed by the Patni Regulation and Bengal Regulation (8 of 1819) because these Regulations have not been expressly repealed by the TP Act.[20] A surrender of land by razinama and kabulayet under the Bombay Land Revenue Code is not affected by the provisions of the TP Act, and is not void for want of registration.[21] The effect of clause (a) is to maintain intact the statutory force which the legislature has given to local usage in Punjab and Oudh.[22] The Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that because of this clause, section 59 of the TP Act cannot prevail over O 21, rule 34 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that mortgages executed under that rule need not be attested by two witnesses.[23]

(4) Clause (b)—Saving of Incidents of Contract and of Property

A right of partition is an incident of property held in joint tenancy or tenancy in common which is not affected by the Act, and partition may be made orally.[24] Another such incident would be a right of pre-emption.

A mortgagee is entitled to be reimbursed for all costs reasonably incurred in respect of the mortgage security;[25] and this has been described as an implied term of a mortgage saved by this clause.[26]

(5) Zamindar's Right to Share of Sale-price

In certain areas, the zamindar has a customary right to recover one-fourth of the sale consideration for a house sold by the riyaya. This is a customary right of antiquity mentioned in the wajibularz of the village. It is based not on contract or encumbrance, but arises only on sale and is saved by section 2(c) from the operation of section 55. The riyaya has no saleable interest in a house in an agricultural village, but such a right is given to him on the understanding that if he leaves or abandons it, the zamindar gets one-fourth as zare chahorum. This custom was acknowledged because in settling the house, the zamindar had to make certain investments, and thus the custom matured into a legal force. The custom is not unreasonable or opposed to law.[27]

(6) Clause (c)—Saving of Rights and Liabilities Created before the Act

This clause follows the general rule that in the absence of a clear indication to the contrary, statutes affecting substantive rights are not retrospective. All rights, liabilities and remedies constituted before the TP Act came into force, are left in precisely the same position as if the

TP Act had not been passed. Thus, a mortgage executed before the TP Act is not invalid on the ground that it does not comply with the requirement of section 59 as to attestation.[28]

The provisions of the TP Act do not apply to a tenancy created before the TP Act came into force.[29] Section 108 (j) is not retrospective, and a tenancy, which was not transferable before the TP Act, does not become so, by virtue of that section.[30] Provisions of section 108 (o) as to waste do not apply to a lease executed before the Act.[31] Similarly, section 111(d) has no application to leases executed before the TP Act, and a mokarari lease granted before the TP Act is not extinguished by merger in a patni subsequently granted.[32]

(7) Clause (d)—Transfer by Operation of Law

The TP Act, save and except certain exceptions referred to below, does not apply to transfers by the operation of law, but is limited, as stated in the preamble, to transfers "by act of parties". A transfer by the operation of law is not validated or invalidated by anything contained in the TP Act.[33] Transfers by operation of law occur in cases of testamentary and intestate succession, forfeiture, insolvency and court-sales. A purchaser at a court-sale acquires title by operation of law,[34] and at such sales, title is transferred without a registered deed;[35] a purchaser of a debt at an execution sale is not affected by section 135.[36] The title of the auction purchaser is derived from the sale certificate, and not from the dakhalnama which is simply a document of delivery of possession.[37]

Questions have arisen as to whether transfers between parties under orders or directions issued under legislation such as the Essential Commodities Act are "sales" within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act. It has been held that there is no sale where the element of mutual assent is absent, as is the case when property is compulsorily acquired.[38] The Supreme Court in Vishnu Agencies (Pvt) Ltd v Commercial Tax Officer,[39] held that a mere regulatory law even if it circumscribes the area of free choice does not take away the basic character, or the core of sale from the transaction. Such a law which governs a class, may oblige sellers to deal only with parties holding licences who may buy particular or allotted quantities of goods at specified prices, but an essential element of choice is still left to the parties between whom agreements took place. The court held that cases[40] of compulsory acquisition by the state stand on a different footing since in such cases, there is neither any question of offer and acceptance, nor of consent, either express or implied.

The principle of these decisions must be applied with caution to the provisions of TP Act, as an involuntary "sale" is not necessarily a transfer by the operation of law. Legislature can modify, annul and substitute the contracts inter-vivos. Therefore, when by a legislative provision parties to the lease are substituted, it cannot be held that there is assignment or transfer of the lease or sub-letting of the premises, by the lessee to the person or authority in whom the leasehold rights are vested by operation of law.[41]

However, although section 2(d) makes the TP Act inapplicable to transfers by operation of law, the principle of some sections, for instance section 36,[42] section 44,[43] and section 53[44] has been applied to such transfers.

Exception as to section 57 and chapter IV of the Act

An exception is made with reference to section 57 and chapter IV as the latter provides for the transfer and extinction of a mortgagor's interest by a decree of the court, and the former provides for the discharge of encumbrances by order of a court. With reference to these sections, section 2(d) overrides the provisions of section 5.[45]

(8) Mahomedan Law

Section 2 says that "nothing in the second Chapter of this Act shall be deemed to affect any rule of Mahomedan law." The reason for this provision is that some of the rules of law differ from the general rules as to the transfer of property enacted in chapter II. Thus, a Mahomedan may settle property in perpetuity for the benefit of his descendants, provided there is an ultimate gift in favour of charity.[46]

This rule is not affected by section 13 and 14 of the TP Act. The Mahomedan law of gifts is expressly saved by section 129. Under that law, writing is not essential to the validity of a gift,[47] but delivery of possession or of such possession as the subject-matter of the gift is susceptible of, is necessary for a transfer by way of gift.[48]

Although section 2 saves rules of Mahomedan law, it does not follow that the general rules in chapter II cannot apply to Mahomedan transfers. These general rules are excluded only if there is an inconsistent rule of Mahomedan law. Where there is no inconsistent rule of Mahomedan law, the sections in chapter II apply proprio vigore, for all that section 2 says is that nothing in chapter II shall be deemed to affect any rule of Mahomedan law. However, in any case not covered either by the sections in chapter II or by Mahomedan law, the English law is applied on the ground of justice, equity and good conscience.[49]

(9) Hindu Law

The TP Act as it stood before the amending Act 20 of 1929, also saved rules of Hindu law. The word "Hindu" has been omitted as the differences between that law and the TP Act have now been removed. These differences were:

(1) The rule in Tagore v Tagore[50] and Chundi Churn v Sidheswari,[51] that bequests and transfer in favour of unborn persons are wholly void, was in conflict with sections 13, 14 and 20 of the TP Act. The Hindu law on this subject had been modified by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 1916, Madras Act, 1914, and Act 8 of 1921, which validated such transfers. These Acts have been amended by sections 11, 12 and 13 of Act 21 of 1929, and the effect of the amendments is that subject to the limitations in chapter II of TP Act and in sections 113, 114, 115 and 116 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, no transfer inter vivos, or by will of property by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not born at the date of such disposition. The TP Act is in consonance with these amendments and so the word "Hindu" is omitted in this section.

(2) Another difference was the rule enacted in sections 15 and 16 of the TP Act before the amendment in 1929, that if a transfer to a class fails as to some of its members by reason of remoteness, it fails as to the whole class. This was in conflict with Hindu law, and the sections have been amended so as to accord with the law.

(10) Rule of Damdupat

The Hindu rule of damdupat, under which interest exceeding principal cannot be received at any one time, ceases to operate from the date of a suit on a mortgage.[52] There are conflicting decisions as to whether the rule applies in the case of mortgages governed by the TP Act, it being held by Madras High Court that it does not,[53] and by Bombay and Calcutta High Courts,[54] that it does. The amendment of section 2(d) by Act 20 of 1929 does not affect those decisions.

(11) Buddhist Law

Prior to 1929, the TP Act saved rules of Buddhist law, but the words "or Buddhist" which occurred in section 2(d) have now been omitted.

(12) Government Grants

Government grants are exempted from the operation of the TP Act by section 2 of the Government Grants Act, 1895. That Act excludes the operation of the TP Act to transfers made by or on behalf of the government.[55] Thus, the rights and obligations of parties would be governed by the terms of the provisions of the Government Grants Act, 1895, where under the government would be entitled to impose limitations and restrictions upon grants and other transfers made by it or under its authority.[56]

Where there is ambiguity in the document of grant, the terms of the grant have to be construed strictly against the grantor and in favour of the grantee.[57]

3. Interpretation-clause.—In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context,—

"immovable property" does not include standing timber, growing crops, or grass;

"instrument" means a non-testamentary instrument;

"[58][attested", in relation to an instrument, means and shall be deemed always to have meant attested by two or more witnesses each of whom has seen the executant sign or affix his mark to the instrument, or has seen some other person sign the instrument in the presence and by the direction of the executant, or has received from the executant a personal acknowledgment of his signature or mark, or of the signature of such other person, and each of whom has signed the instrument in the presence of the executant; but it shall not be necessary that more than one of such witnesses shall have been present at the same time, and no particular form of attestation shall be necessary;]

(1) Amendments

The only amendment made in this section by the amendment Act of 1929 is with regard to the definition of "a person is said to have notice".

(2) Immovable Property—General

The distinction between movable and immovable property was explained by Holloway J in an old case[64] decided by Madras High Court, as follows:

> Movability may be defined to be the capacity in a thing of suffering alteration of the relation of place immovability in capacity for such alteration. If, however, a thing cannot change its place without injury to the quality by virtue of which it is, what it is, it is immovable. Certain things such as a piece of land are in all circumstances immovable. Other things such as trees attached to the ground are, so long as they are so attached, immovable; when the severance has been effected they become movable.

The definition of "immovable property" in section 3(26) of the General Clauses Act is not exhaustive. That definition is as follows:

Immovable property shall include land, benefits to arise out of land, and things attached to the earth, or permanently fastened to anything attached to the earth.

The TP Act defines the phrase "attached to the earth", but gives no definition of immovable property beyond excluding standing timber, growing crops and grass. These are no doubt excluded because they are only useful as timber, corn and fodder after they are severed from the land. Before they are so severed, they pass on transfer of the land under section 8 as things attached to the earth.

A "benefit to arise out of land" is an interest in land and, therefore, immovable property. The Registration Act, however, expressly includes as immovable property benefits arising out of land, hereditary allowances, rights of way, lights, ferries and fisheries.

From a combined reading of the definition of "immovable property" in section 3 of the TP Act and section 3(5) of the General Clauses Act, it is evident that in an immovable property, there is neither mobility, nor marketability as understood in the excise law.[65]

In the larger definition of "immoveable property" "anything attached to the earth" would normally be treated as immoveable property and a tree which is attached to the earth and seeks its nourishment and sustenance from the soil in which it stands will be deemed to be attached to the earth with the only distinction that if it was tree of a kind which is usually used as timber and was of sufficient size so as it could be used as such and is intended to be severed from the soil reasonably thereafter, it may be treated to be immoveable property. Therefore, apart from the size of the trees, the relevant consideration would be the intention to cut the tree or to let it remain attached to the earth. In the former case, it will be termed as "standing timber" while in the latter it must remain immovable property.[66]

(3) Various items of Property

The definition of immovable property in the General Clauses Act applies to TP Act.[67] Since the definition in the TP Act is negative and not exhaustive, section 3(26) of General Clause Act applies except as modified by the definition in the first clause of section 3.[68] In the absence of a special definition, general definition must prevail.[69]

The following have been held to be immovable property:

A tree (except standing timber),[70] varashasan or annual allowance charged on land;[71] a right to collect dues at a fair held on a plot of land;[72] a haat or market;[73] a right to possession and management of a saranjam;[74] a malikana;[75] a right to collect or jana;[76] a life interest in the income of immovable property;[77] a right of way;[78] a ferry;[79] a fishery;[80] a lease of land.[81] The Supreme Court has held that trees, which at the time of agreement for sale, were mere saplings on the land would vest in the transferee.[82] Right of enjoyment of immovable property under a lease (section 105) is immovable property, and would pass under a will which uses the words "all my movable and immovable properties."[83] The right of enjoyment contemplated by section 105 is an interest in the immovable property. The agreement of lease confers on the lessee the right to possess the immovable property which is subject matter of the lease. Where the words used in the will were "all my movable and immovable properties", those words would cover a tenancy also.[84] It has been held by the Supreme Court[85] that a right to enter upon land and to carry away fish from a lake is a right to profits a pendre and that it amounts to immovable property in India as a benefit arising from land. Therefore, the sale of tank excavated out of fertile land and on which fisheries rights were being exercised has to be made by registered instrument.[86] Similarly, a right to enter upon land and remove trees has been held by the Supreme Court to require registration.[87] A right to graze over the land of another is a profit.[88] Under these decisions, right to profits a pendre are benefits arising from land, and, therefore, immovable property, unless they relate to standing timber, growing crops or grass, which are specifically excluded by section 3. A contract for the purpose of felling, cutting, obtaining and removing bamboo from forest areas "for the purpose of converting the bamboo into paper pulp or for purposes connected with the manufacture of paper or in any connection incidental therewith" was held to be a grant of a profit a prendre, or a benefit to arise out of land.[89] A right given to rear lac has been held to amount to a loan interest in immovable property,[90] and so is a right to collect rents from tenants who pay for the use and occupation of land.[91] On the other hand, a royalty is not immovable property;[92] nor a right to recover maintenance though charged on land;[93] nor the right of a purchaser to have the land purchased registered in his name.[94]

With reference to the Limitation Act, 1963, the Privy Council said that the words "immovable property" were used as something less technical than "real", and included all that would be real property under English law and possibly more, and that if the nature and quality of the property can only be determined by Hindu law and usage, the Hindu law may properly be invoked for the purpose.[95] Accordingly, a todayira's hak or an inamdar's right to an annual payment from a village is immovable property.[96] For the same reason, a priest's right to recover dues at a funeral;[97] a right granted by the Peshwas to levy toll on exports of grain;[98] and a right of assessment[99] have been held to be immovable property. On the other hand, a pala or turn of worship is movable property.[100] A yajman vritti though treated as immovable property, is not immovable property in the proper sense of the word and the assignment of a right to collect offerings from yajmans for a period of years is not a lease.[101] Similarly, the amount payable by a yajman to a panda when the former visits the holy place is not immovable property.[102] A vested remainder is immovable property.[103] Plant and machinery permanently embedded in the earth with an intention to use it as such has to be construed as immovable property.[104] The mere attachment to earth does not qualify a plant to be treated as immovable property and to qualify as immovable property, the attachment has to be for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of the land and should not have separate existence devoid of the land.[105]

(4) Mortgages

An equity of redemption is immovable property,[106] and so is the mortgagee's interest in the immovable property mortgaged.[107] There are many conflicting decisions as to whether a mortgage debt is immovable property, but since a mortgage debt has been excluded from the definition of an actionable claim by Act 2 of 1900, it seems that a mortgage debt is for all intents and purposes, immovable property,[108] though for the purposes of attachment it is treated as movable property.[109] A Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court has said that a mortgage, being a transfer of an interest in immovable property, is immovable property, and that a suit to enforce a mortgage is a suit for land under the Letters Patent of the Chartered High Courts.[110]

(5) Standing Timber

Standing timber are trees fit for use for the purpose of building or repairing houses.[111] This is an exception to the general rule that growing trees are immovable property.[112] In order that trees may be considered to be standing timber, they must first be trees whose wood is suitable for use for building houses, bridges, ships, etc.[113] In English law, this would refer to oak, ash or elm trees;[114] and in India, to neem, shisham,[115] babul,[116] or teak trees.[117] If a tree is a growing tree, drawing sustenance from the soil, it is immovable property; where, however, it is to be cut soon, the amount of sustenance it will draw from the soil is negligible, and is to be disregarded. This distinction is well brought out by Sir Edward Vaughan Williams in a passage cited by Lord Coleridge CJ in Marshall v Green:[118]

> The principle of these decisions appears to be this, that wherever at the time of the contract it is contemplated that the purchaser should derive a benefit from the further growth of the thing sold from further vegetation and from the nutriment to be afforded by the land, the contract is to be considered as for an interest in land; but where the process of vegetation is over, or the parties agree that the thing sold shall be immediately withdrawn from the land, is to be considered as a mere warehouse of the thing sold, and the contract is for goods.

In a separate but concurring judgment in Shantabai v State of Bombay,[119] Bose J has adopted the same test; and the same view has been taken in some other decisions.[120]

A fruit-bearing tree would not be standing timber, and would be classed as immovable property;[121] in areas, however, where mango trees are used for building or repairing houses, it may be standing timber.[122] A mahua tree is not standing timber;[123] nor palm or date-trees used for the purpose of drawing toddy.[124] An agreement to sell standing and fallen mango and jackfruit trees on the estate is an agreement to sell immovable property.[125] In execution of a decree passed in a money suit, the trees and bamboo clumps in agricultural lands of the plaintiffs, who were having half-share in the land and were not parties to the money suit, were auctioned, treating the trees and bamboo clumps to be movable property (being standing timber). However, for nearly 10 years thereafter, no effort was made by the purchasers to cut the trees as timber, and there was nothing to show that the purchasers made any effort to either seek an auction of trees in order to share half the price for which they may be sold, or in any way to seek partition of same. It could not be presumed that the purchasers actually intended to cut away the trees as timber. Thus, the trees and bamboo clumps must be held to be immovable property and the Small Cause Court did not have jurisdiction to proceed to execute the decree by sale of the trees, treating them as "movable property".[126]

If all the factors go to indicate that the parties intended to deal with the tree as timber, then it would be called standing timber. Standing timber is not "immovable property" and a document relating thereto, does not require registration.[127]

(6) Growing Crops

These are not limited to annual crops or emblements as they are called in English law. Growing crops have been held to include all vegetable growths, which have no existence apart from their produce such as pan leaves[128] and sugarcane.[129]

(7) Grass

Grass is movable property, but it would appear that a right to cut grass would be an interest in land and, therefore, immovable property. A sale of growing grass to be moved and made into hay by the purchaser has been held in English law to be an interest in land,[130] but not so, if the vendor has to cut the grass and deliver it to the purchaser.[131] A lease of a mango grove entitling the lessee to the grass growing on the land is a lease in respect of immovable property. In a case decided by Full Bench of Madras High Court case,[132] Collins CJ said:

> It has long been settled that an agreement for the sale and purchase of growing grass, growing timber or underwood, or growing fruit, not made with a view to their immediate severance and removal from the soil and delivery as chattels to the purchaser, is a contract for the sale of an interest in land.

(8) Movable Property

There is no definition of movable property in the TP Act. Movable property has been defined in the General Clauses Act to mean "property of every description except immovable property". The Registration Act defines movable property to include property of every description excluding immovable property, but including standing timber, growing crops and grass.[133] Electricity is a movable property.[134]

(9) Instrument

The definition of movable property excludes a will. The word instrument is used in the sense defined in Somu v Rangammal[135] as being not only evidence of the transaction, but the transaction itself.

When execution of the Will is fully proved then in order to ascertain the wishes of the testator we have to look to the text of the Will. The intention of the testator has to be discerned from the language used in the Will. If a Will appears on the face of it to have been duly executed and attested in accordance with the requirements of the Statute, a presumption of due execution and attestation applies.[136] The Supreme Court, in Mathai Samuel v Eapen Eapen (dead) by LRs,[137] declared that "subsequent events or conduct of parties after the execution of the document shall not be taken into consideration in interpreting a document especially when there is no ambiguity in the language of the document."

(10) Attested

The definition of the word "attested" was inserted by the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act 27 of 1926, and was further amended by the insertion of the words "and shall be deemed always to have meant" by the Repealing and Amending Act, 1927, to show that the definition had retrospective effect.

Section 63 of the Indian Succession Act read with section 68 of the Evidence Act and section 3 of the TP Act makes a mandatory obligation to have the document attested, and evidence of such attestation be made available before the court at the time of the trial.[138]

In English law, attestation implies that the attesting witness was present at execution, and can testify that the deed was executed voluntarily by the proper person.[139] Prior to 1912, the courts in India were sharply divided as to whether the word is used in this narrow sense in the TP Act, or whether it includes attestation on admission of execution as in the case of Indian Succession Act. The Allahabad and Bombay High Courts put the latter wider construction upon the word,[140] while the Madras and Calcutta High Courts favoured the narrow construction,[141] subject perhaps to relaxation in the case of pardanashin women.[142] In 1912, however, the Privy Council in the case of Shamu Patter v Abdul Kader,[143] held that an attesting witness must have seen the executant sign. The Transfer of Property (Validating) Act, 1917 was passed to validate instruments attested on admission of execution in reliance on the decisions by Allahabad and

Bombay High Court. Shamu Patter's case was followed until the enactment of Act 27 of 1926, which inserted in the TP Act a definition including attestation on acknowledgement of execution.[144] The TP Act being declaratory of the law, was held in the undermentioned case[145] to be retrospective. In other cases, however, it was said that the words "attest means" cannot have the same meaning as "attest always meant",[146] and the legislature by Act, 10 of 1927 further amended the definition by adding after the word "means", the words "and shall always be deemed to have meant." This makes it clear that the definition is retrospective.[147]

To attest is to bear witness to a fact. It means signing of the document to signify the attestor, and his witness to the execution of the document. An attesting witness is one who signs the document in the presence of the executor after seeing the execution of the document, and after receiving a personal acknowledgment from the executant as regards the execution of the document.[148]

The essential conditions of a valid attestation are that two or more witnesses have seen the executant sign the instrument, or have received from him a personal acknowledgement of his signature, and each of them has signed the instrument in the presence of the executant to bear witness to this fact; it is essential that the attesting witness has put his signature animus attestandie, i.e., for the purpose of attesting the signature.[149] Where the attesting witnesses were neither present at the time of execution of the sale deed nor had even seen the executants, the deed is not validly executed.[150]

The essential ingredients of the proof of attestation are that it is necessary that the person relying upon a document must establish that the executant has signed or put thumb impression before the attesting witness, and the attesting witness must sign in presence of executant.[151] It is necessary for a party relying upon an attested document to plead specifically both the execution and attestation of it.[152]

The burden is on the propounder to prove due and valid execution of the will. The propounder is required to show by satisfactory evidence that the will was signed by the attestator, and that at the relevant point of time the attestator was in a sound and disposing state of mind, and that he understood the nature and the fact of dispossession when he put his signature to the document out of his own free will.[153] When such clinching evidence is adduced in support of the will and the witnesses are uninterested and satisfactory, the court would be justified in making the finding in favour of the propounder. If such evidence is brought on record which is clinching and proves the execution and attestation to be genuine and valid, then the burden would shift on the objector.[154]

(11) Who may Attest

Despite importance of attestation, no qualifications are stipulated in the TP Act in this regard.[155] An illiterate person may attest the signature of the executant by making his mark.[156] A party to a deed cannot be an attesting witness, for the object of attestation is protection against fraud and undue influence.[157] Where a person executes a deed as a power of attorney or an agent of another, he is a party to the deed, and he cannot attest his own signature.[158] However, a person interested in the transaction, such as a person interested in the money advanced under a mortgage, may be an attesting witness if he is not a party to the deed;[159] and the person who advanced the money may attest a mortgage in favour of his benamidar.[160]

The law in India contains well-known principles for the protection of persons, who transfer their property to their own disadvantage, when they do not have the usual means of fully understanding the nature of the effect of what they are doing, on account of certain disabilities. Thus, the disposition of property made by such a disabled person must be substantially understood and must really be the mental act, as against the execution which is a mere physical act of the person who makes it.[161] Where the deed was written in English; but both the executants, who was an old illiterate lady and the attesting witnesses did not know English, and no evidence was led to show that the contents of the deed were explained to her; it was held that the execution was invalid.[162]

(12) Forming Attestation

Attestation need not be in any particular form, a mere signature is sufficient;[163] it need not be made at any particular place in the deed,[164] but cannot take place before the execution of the deed.[165] Attestation prior to execution of the document is no attestation in the eyes of law.[166] However, the section requires that the attesting witness should have signed in the presence of the executant;[167] otherwise the deed is not validly attested even though the attesting witness did actually witness execution.[168] Where the executant, a pardanashin lady, sitting behind a curtain, put her hand out and made her thumb impression on the deed in sight of the witness and then her husband signed, and then the attesting witnesses signed as such, the Privy Council held that the witnesses signed "in the presence of the executant" and the document was duly attested.[169] However, where one out of two witnesses to a mortgage bond signed his name as an attesting witness for himself and on behalf of the other witness in the latter's presence, the attestation was valid though the other witness did not make his mark.[170] Where two deeds were prepared and executed as a part of one transaction, but the marginal witnesses were not common, it was held that merely from the circumstance that the disputed agreement had another set of marginal witnesses, it could not be inferred that the document was forged or fictitious.[171]

Scribe as Attesting Witness

It is necessary that the attesting witness should have signed for the purpose of authenticating the signature of the executant,[172] and not as a scribe,[173] or as a person merely indicating his consent to the transaction.[174] The Supreme Court has held that the effect of subscribing a signature on the part of the scribe is not of the same status as that of the attesting witness. The animus to attest is not available so far as the scribe is concerned: he is not a witness to the will but a mere writer of the will.[175] A scribe who has signed on behalf of a party, e.g. an illiterate mortgagor, cannot be an attesting witness for that would amount to attestation of his own signature.[176] However, where an illiterate mortgagor has made his mark himself and the scribe wrote a description of the mark beside it, he was held to be competent to sign as an attesting witness.[177] In some earlier decisions therefore, it was held that a scribe is not a witness to the will, but a mere writer of the will,[178] and he may sign for him, if so authorised,[179] but not otherwise.[180]

A scribe, however, may perform a dual role. He may be an attesting witness as well as the writer. The fact that he signed as an attesting witness, that he did so with the necessary animus to attest, must be duly proved.[181] That is also the case with identifying witnesses.[182] A person can be called an attesting witness when he has witnessed the execution of the document, and has put his signature by describing himself as an attesting witness. Where a person had put his signatures on the document both, as a scribe and as an attesting witness, the inference is that he functioned both as scribe and as an attesting witness.[183]

(13) Registering Officer as Attesting Witness

There was a conflict of decisions as to whether the signature of the registering officer and of the attesting witnesses on the registrar's endorsement made to satisfy the requirements of the Registration Act, constitute a valid attestation if made in the presence of the executant. Some decisions had held such attestations to be valid;[184] but there were contrary decisions.[185] In Abdul Jabbar v Venkata Sastri,[186] the Supreme Court has held that such signatures can only amount to a valid attestation if the attesting witnesses had put their signatures with such animus; the court further held that ordinarily the registering officer put his signature in the performance of his statutory duty, and not with an intention to attest.

Proof of an Attested Instrument

Proof of an attested instrument is according to sections 68 to 71 of the Indian Evidence Act. The amendment of section 68 by Act 31 of 1926 makes it unnecessary to call any attesting witness in the case of a deed, unless the execution of the deed is specifically denied by the person by whom it purports to have been executed.[187] Where execution is specifically denied, at least one attesting witness must be called to prove the deed, if there be one alive, and subject to the process of the court. If the attesting witnesses are dead, their signatures can be proved by evidence of handwriting.[188] This is not necessary if execution is admitted;[189] but the admission must be not only of execution but of due execution;[190] for an admission will not render valid a document which the evidence shows to be invalid in law.[191] It has also been held that an admission will not suffice if it is established on evidence that the document has not been duly attested.[192] The admission by one mortgagor will not dispense with the necessity of proof against the other.[193] However, even where the execution of a mortgage is admitted, the party must prove that it was duly attested.[194]

(14) Attestation as Proof of Consent

Mere attestation does not effect an estoppel, for attestation does not fix an attesting witness with knowledge of the contents of the document.[195] Attestation does not of itself imply consent;[196] though there may be circumstances which show that the attesting witness had knowledge of the contents of the document he attested and consented to.[197] An attesting witness is not estopped by his mere signature, unless it can be established by independent evidence that to the signature an express condition was attached to the effect that it was intended to convey something more than a mere witnessing to the execution, and was meant as involving consent to the transaction.[198]

(15) Registered

The registration must be valid according to the law for the time being in force. Thus, if the description is not sufficient to identify the property;[199] or if there is a fraud on the law of registration;[200] or if the property is situated in a different circle;[201] or if the deed was not presented by the proper person;[202] or if the description is insufficient to identify the property,[203] the registration is void.

(16) Attached to the Earth

The phrase "attached to the earth" occurs in the definition of immovable property in the General Clauses Act, and also in section 8 of TP Act with reference to the legal incidents of immovable property which pass, without express mention, on transfer; and again in section 108(h) with reference to things a lessee may remove. Section 3 defines the expression "attached to the earth" as including:

(a) things rooted in the earth such as trees;

(b) things embedded in the earth such as buildings; and

(c) things attached to what is so embedded, such as doors and windows.

(17) English and Indian Law of Fixtures

The English law as to fixtures is based on the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit[204] as to trees, and quicquid inaedificatur solo, solo cedit[205] as to buildings, the application of these maxims is varied by a plethora of exceptions in favour of a tenant, and in favour of trade fixtures. The term "fixture" has no precise meaning in English law and is not found in Termes de la Ley,[206] but it is generally applied to something annexed to the freehold. The classification as immovable property of things attached to the earth, bears some analogy to the English law of fixtures, but the maxims on which the English law is founded do not generally apply in India. Long before the TP Act was enacted, Paramanick's case[207] settled that it was the common law of India that buildings and other improvements do not by the mere accident of their attachment to the soil become the property of the owner of the soil.

The general rule laid down by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in the above mentioned case was as follows:

> We think it should be laid down as a general rule that, if he who makes the improvement is not a mere trespasser, but is in possession under any bona fide title or claim of title, he is entitled either to remove the materials restoring the land to the state in which it was before the improvement was made, or to obtain compensation for the value of the building if it is allowed to remain for the benefit of the owner of the soil—the option of taking the building, or allowing the removal of the material remaining with the owner of the land, in those cases in which the building is not taken down by the builder during the continuance of any estate he may possess.

The Mahomedan law is the same.[208] The Indian legislature has departed from the English law of fixtures in section 2 of the Mesne Profits and Improvements Act, 1855, corresponding to section 51 of TP Act,[209] and again in section 108(h) of T P Act dealing with the lessee's right to remove fixtures.[210] The TP Act inclines to the law as recognised by Hindu and Mahomedan jurisprudence.[211]

(18) Things Rooted in the Earth

Trees and shrubs rooted in the earth are immovable property according to the definition in the General Clauses Act, but this definition is subject to the exception made in TP Act as to standing timber, growing crops or grass. In Rustomjee Edulji Sheth v Collector of Tanna,[212] the judicial committee said that the trees upon the land were part of the land, and that the right to cut down and sell those trees was incident to the proprietorship of the land. In the case of Suresh Chand v Kundan,[213] the Supreme Court has held that the standing trees, as also saplings being embedded in the earth are part of the land, and if there is any transfer of property and, unless there is any expressed or implied different intention appearing in the agreement, the interest in the property would also include anything attached with the land which is agreed to be sold. Trees growing out of a garden wall belong to the owner of the garden,[214] a mortgage with possession of a fruit bearing tree with the intention that the mortgagee is to enjoy the fruit but not fell the tree, is a mortgage of immovable property.[215]

Trees and shrubs may be sold apart from the land, to be cut and removed as wood, and in that case, they are movable property.[216] However, if the transfer includes the right to fell the trees for a term of years, so that the transferee derives a benefit from further growth, the transfer is treated as one of immovable property,[217] but the fact that a permit to fell trees extends over a period of several years does not necessarily imply that the transferee is to enjoy the benefit of further growth, and a permit to fell and remove trees for four years has been held to be a grant of movable property.[218] A right to collect lac from trees has been held to be immovable property.[219]

Where under an agreement[220] the plaintiff was given the right to remove soil and earth from the defendant's land, and was to level the plots after removal, it was held to be an agreement for sale of an interest in land. Where, however, there was a contract to draw and remove sludge from a tank and a lagoon, which was continuously being pumped into the tank and the lagoon, the Calcutta High Court held that the sludge was not immovable property as it had not lain long enough to become part of the earth, and had retained its identity.[221]

(19) Things Embedded in the Earth

A house being embedded in the earth is immovable property, and this is so even if it is sold for enjoyment as a house with an option to pull it down.[222] Under English law, the general rule is that whatever is annexed to the freehold becomes part of the realty under the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit.[223] This maxim does not apply in India; nevertheless the question whether a chattel is embedded in the earth so as to become immovable property is decided by the same principles as those which determine what constitutes an annexation to the land under English law. This is a question which is difficult to determine. The classic instance is an anchor which may be embedded in the land temporarily to hold a ship, or permanently to support a suspension bridge. In Holland v Hodgson[224] Blackburn J said:

> There is no doubt that the general maxim of the law is that what is annexed to the land becomes part of the land; but it is very difficult if not impossible, to say with precision what constitutes an annexation sufficient for this purpose. It is a question which must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating the intention, viz. the degree of annexation and the object of the annexation. When the article in question is no further attached to the land than by its own weight, it is generally to be considered a mere chattel; as was the case in Wiltshear v Cottrel.[225] However, even in such a case if the intention is apparent to make the articles part of the land, they do become part of the land as was the case in D'Eyncourt v Gregory.[226]
> Thus, blocks of stone placed one on top of another without any mortar or cement for the purpose of forming a dry stone wall would become part of the land, though the same stones if deposited in a builder's yard and for convenience sake stacked on the top of each other in the form of a wall, would remain chattels. On the other hand, an article may be firmly fixed to the land, and yet the circumstances may be such as to show that it was never intended to be a part of the land, then it does not become part of the land. The anchor of a large ship must be very firmly fixed to the ground in order to bear the strain of the cable, yet no one could suppose > that it became part of the land, even though it should chance that the ship owner was also the owner of the fee of the spot where the anchor was dropped. An anchor similarly fixed in the soil for the purpose of bearing the strain of the chain of a suspension bridge would be part of the land. Perhaps the true rule is, that articles not otherwise attached to the land than by their own weight are not to be considered part of the land, unless the circumstances are such as to show that they were intended to be part of the land, the onus of showing that they were so intended, lies on those who assert they have ceased to be chattels, and that, on the contrary, an article which is affixed to the land even slightly is to be considered as part of the land unless the circumstances are such as to show that it was intended all along to continue as a chattel, the onus lying on those who contend that it is a chattel.

The two tests, therefore, are:

(1) the degree or mode of annexation; and

(2) the object of annexation.

(20) Mode of Annexation, English Law

In Wake v Halt[227] Lord Blackburn said:

> The degree and nature of the annexation is an important element for consideration; for where a chattel is so annexed that it cannot be removed without great damage to the land, it affords a strong ground for thinking that it was intended to be annexed in perpetuity to the land;

and as Lord Hardwicke said in Lawton v Lawton:[228]

> You shall not destroy the principal thing by taking away the accessory to it. Thus looms attached to the floor and to the beams of a mill,[229] or tip up seats fastened to the floor of a cinema,[230] or advertisement hoardings firmly imbedded in the earth have been held to be part of the land.[231] But cisterns merely standing by their own weight,[232] or brewer's vats resting on brick-work and timber,[233] or tapestries which can be removed without structural injury to the house,[234] or green houses merely resting on the soil,[235] have been held to be chattels.

(21) Object of Annexation, English Law

The object of annexation is the more important consideration.[236] This is a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances in each case, an important element being the nature of the interest in the land possessed by the person who causes the annexation. Thus, if a tenant for years or a tenant for life fixes tapestry to a wall, it may readily be inferred that he did not intend them to become fixture,[237] though the circumstances may show that he did so intend.[238] Such an intention is more readily inferred in the case of a tenant in fee simple.[239] Articles which may be removed without structural damage and even articles merely resting by their own weight are fixtures, if they are added with the intention of permanently improving the premises. A gas engine fastened by bolts and nuts to a concrete floor by a tenant in fee simple subject to a mortgage,[240] and looms in a mill fastened to beams,[241] and machinery fastened by bolts and nuts to concrete beds have been held to be fixtures.[242] Looms in a mill fastened to the floor pass under an assignment of fixed machinery.[243]

(22) The same Tests in Indian Law

The same two tests as to mode of annexation and object of annexation have been applied in India. In a case under the Registration Act, Jenkins CJ held that machinery was not immovable property, as it had been erected by a monthly tenant.[244] If the lease contemplates the removal of machinery, it cannot be regarded as having been permanently fixed.[245] Greater stress is, however, laid on the mode of annexation. In Chaturbhuj v Bennet,[246] the court said that for qualifying as fixture it must be attached to the earth as that expression is defined in section 3 of the TP Act. A hut is immovable property,[247] even if it is sold with an option to pull it down.[248] A mortgage of the superstructure of a house though expressed to be exclusive of the land beneath, creates an interest in immovable property,[249] as it is permanently attached to the ground on which it is built. Similarly, oil and flour mills and the machinery used in working them, are fixtures.[250] In another case,[251] it has been held that the test is whether the annexation is with the object of the permanent beneficial enjoyment of the land or building; so, machinery for metal-shaping and electro-plating which was attached by bolts to special concrete bases and could not be easily moved, was still held not to be a part of the structure housing it, or the soil beneath it. The court held that the machinery was not attached for the more beneficial enjoyment of either the soil, or the concrete; it was actually a case of the structure being built around the machinery to protect it. A corrugated iron shed which rested by its own weight on the foundation prepared, was held to be a chattel which may be removed by a lessee.[252]

(23) Trade Fixtures

With a view to encourage trade, English law[253] allows relaxation of the rules with reference to trade fixtures. These are regarded as accessory to the business, and not as an annexation to the premises. Thus, soap boiling vats,[254] engines for working collieries,[255] and machinery and buildings erected on a colliery by miners working under a local custom[256] are not fixtures. Similarly, in India, distillery vats in a house have been held to be movables, as they are for trade purposes, and not for the beneficial enjoyment of the house.[257] However, this principle has no application where the articles are affixed by persons who are themselves owners of the land.[258]

(24) Hire Purchase Agreement

The existence of a hire purchase agreement does not affect the question of the intention of the annexation.[259] This has been decided in cases where the contest was between the mortgagee of the premises, and the person who had hired the machine to the mortgagor.

ILLUSTRATION

A gas engine was let out on the hire-purchase system under an agreement in writing which provided that it should not become the property of the hirer until the payment of all the instalments, and should be removable by the owner on the failure of the hirer to pay any instalment. The engine was affixed to the land of the hirer by bolts and screws to prevent it from rocking, and was used by him for the purposes of his trade. Default having been made in the payment of the instalments, the engine was claimed by the owner, and also by a mortgagee of the land, who took his mortgage after the hiring agreement and without notice of it, and had entered into possession while the engine was still on the land. It was held that the engine was sufficiently annexed to the land to become a fixture, and that any intention to be inferred from the terms of the hiring agreement that it should remain a chattel, did not prevent it from becoming a fixture; and consequently it passed to the mortgagee as part of the freehold.[260]

(25) Attached to what is so Embedded

The attachment must be, as the section says for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached. Thus, the doors, windows and shutters of a house are attached to the house, which is embedded in the earth, for the beneficial enjoyment of the house. They form part of the house, and have no separate existence.[261] Similar is the case with the movable parts of fixed machinery. However, if the attachment is not intended to be permanent, the articles attached do not form part of the house, e.g. window blinds and sashes,[262] and ornamental articles such as glasses and tapestry fixed by a tenant for life.[263]

A curious case is reported in the Solicitors Journal,[264] where a hired machine which rested by its own weight on the floor was driven by an engine, which was a fixture embedded in the earth. The machine could be lifted and bodily taken away, but it was claimed that it was a fixture because it was attached to the engine. Eve J however, repelled this contention and said:

> With regard to the indirect attachment to the motive power, if I were to hold that that constituted a fixture, then every motive power would be a connection which would change a chattel into a fixture.

The same conclusion would be arrived at under this section, for the machine is not attached for the beneficial enjoyment of the engine, and it is the engine that is subordinate to the machine. If a thing is embedded in the earth or attached to what is so embedded, for the permanent beneficial enjoyment of that to which it is attached, then it is part of the immovable property. Where the attachment is merely for the beneficial enjoyment of the chattel itself, then it remains a chattel, even though fixed for the time being so that it may be enjoyed. The question in each case is to be decided according to the circumstances. An oil engine as part of a cinema on the premises leased;[265] a cinema projector, and a diesel oil engine fixed on earth for the purposes of exhibiting shows in a touring cinema are movable properties.[266]

The machinery of a cotton baling press which was placed in a building to shelter it from the weather, is movable property,[267] as although the building is embedded in the earth, the machinery was not put there for the beneficial enjoyment of the building.

(26) Actionable Claim

The definition of actionable claim was originally contained in section 130. The chapter on actionable claims was remodelled by Act 2 of 1900, and the definition was amended and inserted in this section. The definition is explained in the notes to section 130.

In India, copyright which is chose in action in England, is a beneficial interest in the movable property in the actual or constructive possession of the owner thereof, although strictly not an actionable claim, but capable of being transferred by assignment evidenced by a writing executed by the assignor or by his duly authorised agent.[268]

(27) Notice

The equitable doctrine of notice which controls unconscionable transactions is recognised in various sections of TP Act. For instance, in section 39, if a transfer is made of property out of which a person has a right to receive maintenance, the transferee takes subject to that right if he had notice of it, but not otherwise. Similarly in section 40, if A conveys to C property which he had by a previous contract agreed to sell to B, then B can enforce the contract against C, if C had notice of it, but not otherwise. If C had notice of the prior contract, he purchases with knowledge that it was unconscionable of A to sell to him, and it is, therefore, unconscionable of him to buy. To the same effect is the second illustration to clause (b) of section 27 of the Specific Relief Act, 1872,[269] and section 91 of the Trusts Act, 1882. A person having full notice and knowledge of facts of existence of a previous contract, even through public notice published in a newspaper, cannot be held to be a bona fide purchaser without notice.[270]

Notice may be either express or constructive, while notice to an agent is sometimes called imputed notice in so far as it affects the principal.

(28) Express Notice

Express notice, or actual notice is notice whereby a person acquires actual knowledge of the fact. It must be definite information given in the course of negotiations by a person interested in the property, as a person is not bound to attend to vague rumours or statements by strangers.[271] Notice must be given in the same transaction, as notice given in a previous transaction may have been forgotten.[272] Mere casual conversation is not enough, and in Lloyd v Banks,[273] Lord Cairns said that an encumbrancer who alleges that a trustee has notice of his encumbrance must prove "that the mind of the trustees has in some way been brought to an intelligent apprehension of the nature of the encumbrance which has come upon the property, so that a reasonable man, or an ordinary man of business, would act upon the information and would regulate his conduct by it." A mere statement either in court, or somewhere else, that some person claims title, is not sufficient notice to an auction purchaser of a deed, if it is not disclosed at the auction sale.[274] However, when such an assertion is made to the intending purchaser, it is sufficient to put him to further inquiry as to the interest or title claimed,[275] and so, it would amount to constructive notice of facts which such enquiry would have disclosed.[276]

(29) Constructive Notice

Constructive notice is the equity which treats a man who ought to have known a fact, as if he actually does know it. A well-known case on the subject is Jones v Smith[277] where the following classic passage occurs in the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wigram:

> It is, indeed, scarcely possible to declare a priori what shall be deemed constructive notice, because, unquestionably, that which would not affect one man may be abundantly sufficient to affect another. But I believe, I may, with sufficient accuracy for my present purpose and without danger assert that the cases in which constructive notice has been established resolve themselves into two classes;
> first, cases in which the party charged has had actual notice that the property in dispute was in fact charged, encumbered or in some way affected, and the court has thereupon bound him with constructive notice of facts and instruments, to a knowledge of which he would have been led by an enquiry after the charge, encumbrance or other circumstances affecting the property of which he had actual notice; and > secondly, cases in which the court has been satisfied from the evidence before it that the party charged had designedly abstained from enquiry for the very purpose of avoiding notice...

The proposition of law, upon which the former class of cases proceeds, is not that the party charged had notice of a fact or instrument, which in truth related to the subject in dispute without his knowing that such was the case, but that he had actual notice that it did so relate. The proposition of law, upon which the second class of cases proceed, is not that the party charged had incautiously neglected to make inquiries, but that he had designedly abstained from such inquiries for the purpose of avoiding knowledge—a purpose, which if proved, would clearly show that he had a suspicion of the truth and a fraudulent determination not to learn it. Therefore, where there is no actual notice that the property is in some way affected, and no fraudulent turning away from a knowledge of facts which the res gestae would suggest to a prudent mind; if mere want of caution as distinguished from fraudulent and wilful blindness is all that can be imputed to the purchaser—there, the doctrine of constructive notice will not apply; there, the purchaser will in equity be considered, as in fact he is, a bona fide purchaser, without notice.

However, courts of equity had extended the doctrine from cases of fraudulent turning away to cases of gross negligence, and in a later case,[278] Wigram VC stated that there might be a degree of negligence so gross (crassa negligentia) that a court of justice might treat it as evidence of fraud, although morally speaking the party charged might be perfectly innocent. In truth, fraud and negligence are mutually exclusive conceptions, but courts of equity extended their jurisdiction from fraud to negligence and included gross negligence in the doctrine of constructive notice. In this respect the section follows the English law.

The courts have, however, been reluctant to extend the doctrine to cases where there is no real negligence, as the doctrine results in the imputation of knowledge to the person who does not in fact often possess it.[279]

Constructive notice has been said to arise from an irrebuttable presumption of notice. In Plumb v Fluitt,[280] Eyre, CB said:

> Constructive notice I take to be in its nature no more than evidence of notice, the presumptions of which are so violent that the court will not allow even of its being controverted.

Such a presumption, which is said to be irrebuttable,[281] can arise only in a case in which the party seeking the benefit of that doctrine has acted innocently. The doctrine of constructive notice will not be applied where the party seeking the benefit of that doctrine has been guilty of secrecy or fraud in the transaction with constructive notice of which he seeks to affect a purchaser; and, therefore, a vendor who is bound to disclose an encumbrance cannot plead that the purchaser had constructive notice of it.[282] A decree-holder bringing his judgment debtor's property to sale cannot set up a mortgage to himself which he has not disclosed, and plead that its registration was constructive notice to the purchaser.[283] The doctrine of constructive notice may be applied as against government.[284]

This legal presumption of knowledge arises from—

(a) Wilful abstention from an inquiry or search.[285]

(b) Gross negligence.[286]

(30) Wilful Abstention from an Inquiry or Search

These words recall the expression used by Wigrani, VC in his judgment in Jones v Smith.[287] In the corresponding section 3 of the English Conveyancing Act, 1882, now replaced by section 199 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the words are: "If such enquiries and inspection had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him." With reference to the duty of a purchaser to investigate title, Lord Selborne, in Agra Bank v Barry,[288] said:

> But this, if it can properly be called duty, is not a duty owing to the possible holder of a latent title or security. It is merely the course which a man dealing bona fide in the proper and usual manner for his own interest, ought, by himself or his solicitor, to follow with a view to his own title and security. If he does not follow that course, the omission of it may be a thing requiring to be accounted for or explained. It may be evidence, if it is not explained, or a design inconsistent with bona fide dealing, to avoid knowledge of the true state of the title.

The Calcutta High Court following this case have construed the words "wilful abstention from an enquiry or search" to mean such abstention as would show lack of bona fides.[289] Thus, a person refusing a registered letter cannot afterwards plead ignorance of its contents.[290] The principle that means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge, has been applied to a banker's passbook so as to fix a customer with knowledge and ratification of entries therein.[291] Where a purchaser omits to inspect title deeds, he may be affected with notice of all facts which he would have discovered upon a proper investigation of title.[292] Similarly, the omission by a purchaser to inspect entries in the Record of Rights will amount to wilful abstention from inquiry under this section.[293] Where a charge was registered, but the agent of a subsequent mortgagee omitted to look into the register of the Registrar, the mortgagee was deemed to have had constructive notice of the charge.[294] However, where a charge was not registered in the Record of Rights, which a purchaser was bound to search, he would not be held to have had constructive notice thereof by his omission to inquire elsewhere, e.g., the Mamlatdar's office.[295]

makes no enquiry as to whether he had done so. C has constructive notice of A's lien for unpaid purchase money, and the mortgage is subject to A's lien.[296]

Actual notice of a deed is constructive notice of the contents of the deed, and of all other deeds to which it refers as affecting the same property. Thus, when a deed of sale referred to a partition deed under which the house has fallen to the vendor's share, the purchaser was affected with notice of a right of pre-emption reserved in the deed of partition.[297] Prior to the passing of the Law of Property Act, 1925, a person taking a lease had constructive notice of restrictive covenants entered into by the freeholder.[298] A person who agrees to buy a lease has constructive notice of the covenants in the lease, but only if he had an opportunity of inspecting it.[299] The Calcutta High Court, however, has held that a person acquiring a lease by private transfer, should call for the title deed of the vendor, and has constructive notice of a term in the lease providing for a high rate of interest on arrears of rent.[300] Where executors borrowed money on an equitable mortgage of the testator's title deeds, the mortgagee was held to have constructive notice of a charge on the property mortgaged, created by the will under which the executors represented the estate, if he had investigated the title, he would have had notice of the will and its contents.[301] The abstention from inquiry must be designed, as due to a desire to avoid an inquiry which would lead to ultimate knowledge. A mere omission to make enquiries is not sufficient.[302]

(2) S left his house and land to his sons by his first wife and appointed them executors of his will. He left ₹30,000 to his sons by his second wife, charged on the aforesaid house and land. The sons by the first wife borrowed ₹52,000 from the bank and deposited the title deeds of the house and land with the bank by way of equitable mortgage to secure the loan. The will was not among the documents of title deposited. When the bank enforced their mortgage and brought the house and land to sale, the sons of the second wife claimed that their charge had precedence. If the bank had made inquiry as to how the mortgagors derived title from S, they would have had cognizance of the will. The bank had therefore constructive notice of the charge, and the claim of the sons by the second wife prevailed over the mortgage.[303]

Where the mortgagors had dealt with the bank as executors, the bank would have been entitled to assume that they were acting for the purpose of administration.[304] However, even in that case the bank would have been affected with notice, if the circumstances of the transaction for instance, the fact that the mortgage was to secure advances to the mortgagors personally were such as to afford evidence that the executors were committing a breach of trust.[305]

On the other hand, notice to a purchaser by his title papers in one transaction, will not be notice to him in a subsequent and independent transaction in which the instruments containing the recitals are not necessary to his title.[306] This principle was enunciated by Lord

Redesdale in Hamilton v Royse,[307] and quoted with approval by Smith MR in Tressilian v Caniffe,[308] as follows:

> If a man purchases an estate under a deed, which happens to relate also to other lands not comprised in that purchase, and afterwards purchases the other lands to which an apparent title is made, independent of that deed, the former notice of the deed will not of itself affect him in the second transaction, for he was not bound to carry in his recollection those parts of a deed which had no relation to the particular purchase as was then about, nor to take notice of more of the deed than affected his then purchase.

(3) If B buys two properties X and Y from A, leaves part of the purchase money unpaid and then sells X to C and informs C of A's charge for unpaid purchase money, then C's purchase of X will be subject to A's charge. But if in the following year C also purchases Y from B, and B omits to inform C of A's charge, the information C received when purchasing X will not operate as notice so as to make his purchase of Y subject to A's charge.

There is a well recognised distinction between deeds which must affect the property, and deeds which may or may not affect it. Omission to inspect a deed which necessarily affects title and forms a link in the chain of title involves constructive notice, and a purchaser will not be excused even if the vendor has expressly stated that the deed contains nothing affecting title.[309] However, a purchaser is not presumed to know instruments which are neither directly, nor presumptively connected with the title and may only by possibility affect it.[310] Where the deed does not necessarily affect the property, and the purchaser is informed about the same, he may rely on such an assurance.[311] In Jones v Smith,[312] the intending mortgagee inquired of the mortgagor and his wife if any settlement had been made on their marriage, and was told that a settlement had been made which did not include the husband's property.; the mortgagee accepted his assurance and was not affected with notice that the property mortgaged was infact included in the marriage settlement.

Generally speaking, constructive notice will not be inferred, unless some specific circumstance can be shown as a starting point of an inquiry which if prosecuted, would have led to the discovery of the fact.[313] If the purchaser is informed that there are charges, he will be affected with notice of all charges which he could have ascertained on inquiry.[314] If the purchaser knows that rents are paid to some person other than the vendor, he will be affected with notice of that person's right.[315] Where the purchaser has knowledge that the deeds of the title are in the possession of a third party, he has constructive notice of the same. If the mortgagor says that the deeds are in the possession of the bank for safe custody, and the mortgagee makes no further inquiry of the bank, he will be affected with notice of the pledge, if the deeds prove to be pledged to the bank.[316]

(31) Gross Negligence

Mere negligence or "want of caution", to quote the phrase used by Wigram VC in Jones v Smith,[318] is not penalised with constructive notice. The phrase "gross negligence" was invented by the courts of equity in order to extend their jurisdiction. Equity cannot interfere with the legal title, except in cases of trusts, fraud or accident. Negligence is not fraud, as negligence implies indolence and indifference, while fraud is active dishonesty. However, in extreme cases, courts of equity over came the difficulty by assuming that the negligent person had wilfully shut his eyes to circumstances which called for inquiry. On this assumption, gross negligence was evidence of a fraudulent design which gave the Court of Equity jurisdiction to interfere.[319]

Wigram VC has said that gross negligence is:

> a degree of negligence so gross (crassa negligentia) that a Court of Justice may treat it as evidence of fraud—impute a fraudulent motive to it—and visit it with the consequences of fraud, although (morally speaking) the party charged may be perfectly innocent.[320]

Similarly, in Ware v Lord Eqmont[321] Lord Cranworth said:

> The question, when it is sought to affect a purchaser with constructive notice, is not whether he had the means of obtaining, and might by prudent caution have obtained, the knowledge in question, but whether not obtaining it was an act of gross or culpable negligence.

In more modern times, the courts in England have departed from the doctrine thus laid down in the earlier equity cases in two respects. First, the adjectives "gross" and "culpable" as applied to negligence have been subjected to considerable criticism. Lord Cranworth himself said in the later case of Colyer v Finch:[322]

> Cases are very difficult to deal with when you are obliged to use vituperative epithets of that sort in order to enunciate a principle.

In Wilson v Breit[323] the same learned judge said that gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet. Romer J in Re City Equitable Fire Insurance Company[324] explained that the real distinction between gross negligence and ordinary negligence lies in the difference between the extent of duty to take care imposed in each case. Secondly, the equitable doctrine that gross negligence is negligence which amounts to fraud has also been departed from. It was criticised by Fry LJ in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co v Whipp[325] as involving an inconsistency, fraud "leads men to do or omit doing a thing not carelessly but for a purpose." Negligence does not import the existence of a duty to the public, as Fry LJ said in the case last cited, title deeds are not analogous to ferocious dogs which the owner is under a general duty to keep in safe custody. Lord Cranworth had said in Colyer v Finch[326] that "what constitutes gross negligence is always excessively difficult either to define, or by way of anticipation to illustrate." In Dixon v Muckleslon,[327] Lord Selborne referred gross negligence to the doctrine of estoppel:

> But it must be something, which raises a positive equity against him, upon the principle which in equity, as distinct from law, is conveniently designated by the term "estoppel". In other words, the man who has conducted himself in such a manner is not entitled to deny the truth of his own representations if it be a case of express representation—he is not entitled to deny being bound by the natural consequences of his own acts, if it be a case of positive acts—he is not entitled to refuse to abide by the consequence of his own wilful and unjustifiable neglect, if that is the nature of the case. By one or other of those means, he may have armed another person with the power of going into the world under false colours; and if it be really and truly the case that by his act, or his improper omissions, such an apparent authority and power has been vested in that other person, he is bound upon equitable principles by the use made of that apparent authority and power.

This is a correct statement of the principle and the rule that is followed in England with reference to the postponement of legal mortgages laid down by Lord Lindley in Oliver v Hinton[328] that:

> to deprive a purchaser for value without notice of a prior encumbrance of the protection of the legal estate, it is not in my opinion essential that he should have been guilty of fraud; it is sufficient that he has been guilty of such gross negligence as would render it unjust to deprive the prior encumbrancer of his priority.

This case was followed by the Calcutta High Court in Lloyds Bank Ltd v P F Guzdar & Co[329] dissenting from the dictum of Jenkins J in Monindra v Troylucko Nath[330] that "gross neglect" in section 78 of TP Act means neglect that amounts to evidence of fraud.

Cases of gross negligence which estop a man from denying that he had notice of a fact generally, also fall under the heading "Wilful abstention from an inquiry or search" or under "Registration." Thus, if a purchaser is informed that the deeds of title are in the possession of a bank for safe custody and he omits to make further inquiry of the bank, that is gross negligence which will affect him with notice if the deeds prove to be pledged with the bank.[331] The Privy Council has said that omission to search the register kept under the Registration Act may amount to gross negligence, so as to attract the consequences which result from notice.[332] This ruling has been applied to an omission to search the Revenue Register.[333] Omission to inspect the title of property which a purchaser has contracted to buy, may amount to gross negligence,[334] but not the omission to inspect the title of an adjoining property which prima facie the vendor is under no obligation to produce.[335]

A Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court had held in Nawal Kishore v Agra Municipality,[336] approving Ramjilal v Municipal Board, Lucknow[337] and disapproving Municipal Board v Roop Chand Jain[338] that a person buying property in a municipal area must be deemed to be aware that municipal taxes are a charge on the property, that there is a possibility of such taxes being in arrears, and that it is his duty to inquire about such arrears; if he fails to do so, he would be deemed to have notice of such taxes. A similar view was also taken by the Calcutta High Court.[339] In Ahmedabad Municipality v Haji Abdul,[340] the Supreme Court has disapproved of Nawal Kishore's case, and held that no such general rule of law can be laid down; and, whether it was the duty of the transferee to inquire about such arrears must be judged on the facts of each case.

ILLUSTRATION

G deposited title-deeds of his house in Calcutta with bank N to secure an overdraft in his account. Subsequently, G represented to the bank that he wished to sell his house in order to clear his overdraft. According to the usual practice, the bank should have delivered the title-deeds to their solicitor in order to arrange for their inspection by the solicitor of the prospective purchaser. But G represented that if the prospective purchaser knew that the deeds were pledged, he would beat him down in price and ask for the deeds to be returned to him. Bank N complied and departing from the usual practice, returned the deeds to G. G then mortgaged the house to another bank L. Bank N was guilty of gross negligence which enabled G to induce bank L to advance money on the house as if it was unencumbered. The mortgage of bank N was postponed to the mortgage of bank L.[341]

Sale of part of property

Under the proviso to section 55(3), on selling part of the property, the seller is entitled to retain all the documents of title. Having regard to this provision, the purchaser of a part would not be held guilty of negligence in allowing the title-deeds to remain with the seller. It would, however, be prudent of a purchaser of a part, not getting the deeds, to stipulate that he should be allowed to endorse notice, of the sale on the deeds retained by the seller. Since registration is constructive notice, the risk to the purchaser is slight, but in the absence of a statutory provision making it compulsory to endorse notice of sale of part of the property on the documents retained, there is scope for the seller committing fraud on a third party, e.g. by depositing title-deeds with intent to create security thereon.

(32) Registration as Notice—Explanation I

Explanation I supersedes the former case law as to whether registration of a document under the Registration Act is constructive notice of its contents. The Bombay and Allahabad High Courts had held that registration is notice.[342] The Madras High Court had held that registration is not notice on the ground that if the legislature had so intended, it would have said so.[343] The Calcutta High Court in some cases took the same view as Madras High Court;[344] but the prevailing view in Calcutta High Court was that whether registration operates as notice depends upon the circumstances of each case, i.e., whether the omission to search the register taken with the facts of the case would amount to gross negligence so as to attract the consequences which result from notice.[345] The Privy Council in Tilakdhari Lal v Khedan Lal[346] reviewed all the Indian decisions, and approved of the decision of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in Monindra v Troylucko Nath[347] that the question was not one of law, but of fact to be determined according to the circumstances of each case. Their Lordships stated that though registration had been held for two centuries not to operate as notice in England, yet the legislature, when framing different Registration Acts and the definition of notice in the TP Act, had omitted to enact the principle that registration is notice. This omission has now been supplied. The definite rule now enacted, the effect of which is to oblige all purchasers to exercise diligence in examining titles recorded in the register, avoids the uncertainty and the risk of perjury involved in taking parole evidence as to whether the omission to search the register should in any particular case be attributed to gross negligence. It also fulfils the chief object of registration, which is to provide a record on which every person dealing with property can rely for a full and complete account of all transactions by which his title may be affected.[348] The Supreme Court has set at rest all controversies by holding that registered deed is a constructive notice, and is a deemed notice under section 3 of the TP Act. It was further held that notice is actual as well as constructive, and a plea of bona fide purchaser without notice is not permissible.[349] Any person who wants to deal with an immovable property is deemed to have knowledge of all duly registered instruments relating to the said immovable property.[350]

An unregistered document is unenforceable in the eyes of law for the transfer of property.[351] As the registration of a document which is compulsorily registrable under law amounts to constructive notice on a person aggrieved by the title or interest created by such document, the registration of the perpetual sub lease produced is deemed to act as a constructive notice to the world at large.[352]

In Punjab where the TP Act was not in force, it has been held that the question whether registration operates as notice depends upon the facts of each case.[353] Where a document is not compulsorily registrable, its registration does not amount to constructive notice.[354] Testamentary documents do not come within the purview of notice as contemplated by section 3, expln 1. They are not required to be registered.[355]

(33) Any Person Acquiring

These words indicate that registration is notice to transferees subsequent to the registration,[356] while the registration of a subsequent transaction is not notice to prior transferees.[357]

In a case decided by Allahabad High Court,[358] Sir John Edge said that any reasonably prudent man who was bringing a suit on a mortgage ought to search the registry in order to ascertain what were the dealings with the property whether the dealings were anterior to, or subsequent to his mortgage. This observation goes too far, and it can only have reference to the joinder of parties to the suit. Subsequent encumbrances cannot affect a title that has been vested. A prior mortgagee ought to join a subsequent encumbrancer in a suit for sale; but if he does not do so, the result is that the decree is not binding on the encumbrancer.[359]

The registration of a puisne mortgage is not notice to a prior mortgagee.[360] Nor is registration of a sub-mortgage notice to the mortgagor.[361]

ILLUSTRATION

A mortgages property to B, who grants a sub-mortgage to C. A in ignorance of the sub-mortgage, pays the mortgage debt to B. The fact that the sub-mortgage is registered does not amount to notice of the sub-mortgage to A so as to vitiate the payment.[362]

An equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds is entitled to priority over a subsequently registered mortgage, as it is a perfected conveyance, and not merely an oral agreement to which section 48 of the Registration Act applies.[363] Express provision is now made in this behalf by a proviso inserted in that section of the Registration Act by amending Act 21 of 1929.

Required by law to be registered

Registration is not notice when there is no duty to search the register. A mortgages his goods to B by a registered mortgage, but retains the goods in his own possession. A then sells the goods to C, who is not aware of the mortgage. C acquires a good title to the goods, the law does not require the registration of mortgages of movables, and there was no duty cast upon him to search the register.[364]

However, an assignment deed that conveys title in property for more than Rs. 100/ must be registered.[365]

(34) Time from which Registration Operates as Notice

If the instrument has been registered in the same sub-district as that in which the property is situated, it operates as notice from the date of registration. This is because any person seeking to acquire an interest in the property would inspect the register of that sub-district when investigating title. If, however, the property is situated in several sub-districts, or if registration has been effected under section 30(2) of the Registration Act in another district, the registered deed will not operate as notice until memorandum of such registration has been received and filed by the sub-registrar of the sub-district in which the property is situated under section 66 of the Registration Act.[366] The reason for this distinction is that, the purchaser cannot be expected to search the registers of other sub-districts. In Alliance Bank of Simla v Bhai Kahan,[367] a mortgage-deed affecting properties in more than one sub-district was registered at Lahore, and the chief court held that a purchaser of one of the properties in a different district had notice. The court said:

> As to the registration of the deed being effected in Lahore, the force of the argument is weakened when it is remembered that, when a deed affecting properties in more than one district is registered in Lahore, a copy is sent for record to each district in which any part of the property is.

The point as to the time from which the registration operated as notice did not arise in this case, but this is now settled by the amendment made in explanation I by amending Act 5 of 1930.

(35) Registration is Notice of Registered Instrument

If an instrument is registered in the manner prescribed by the Registration Act, a party cannot be heard to say that he searched the register without finding it, as he must take the consequences of his want of diligence.[368] Notice of a deed is notice of all material facts affecting the property which appear on the face of the deed, or can be reasonably inferred from its contents.[369] It is also notice of all documents recited in the deed and which an examination of the deed would have disclosed, provided the deed forms part of the chain of title and so necessarily affects the property.[370] Where a mortgage is mentioned in a conveyance, the purchaser has constructive notice of other encumbrances referred to in the mortgage. The report of a very old case—Bisco v Earl of Banbury[371] contains the following passage:

> But my Lord Chancellor declared; that there was sufficient notice in law, or an implied notice, for the mortgage to Hewet was excepted in the Defendant's Conveyance, and therefore they could not be ignorant of the Mortgage, and ought to have seen that, and that would have led them to the other Deeds in which, pursued from one to another, the whole case must have been discovered to them.

The High Court of Punjab and Haryana has held that this explanation has no relevance regarding the period of limitation, and does not state that the period starts only from the time when the person concerned came to know of the sale-deeds. The explanation deals with notice of the previous sale to the subsequent purchaser, and has no concern with limitation for pre-emption suits.[372]

ILLUSTRATION

A and his half brother B, effected a partition of the family property, and the deed of partition contained a mutual covenant that if either brother agreed to sell his share of the family house, he would give the other a right of pre-emption. B sold his half share of the house to C by a deed which described the share as acquired under a deed of partition. C had constructive notice of the covenant of pre-emption.[373]

The Bombay High Court had in some cases held that registration did not operate as notice of unregistered instruments referred to in the registered deed.[374] These cases, are no longer good law.

(36) Provisos to Explanation I

The provisos to explanation I are self-explanatory. The first proviso merely repeats what is enacted in the fifth paragraph of the section, that registration must be according to law. The second and third provisos make it clear that a purchaser will not be affected with notice of any fact which has not been correctly entered in the registers and indexes kept by the sub-registrar. In Gordhandas v Mohunlal,[375] the Bombay High Court held that the purchaser was not affected with notice of a registered agreement restricting the use of the property purchased because it was not shown that the agreement was indexed in relation to the property sold.

A mere defect of procedure will not invalidate registration.[376] Cases have occurred in which immovable property which ought to be registered in Book No 1 has been registered in the Miscellaneous Register Book No 4. There is a conflict of decisions as to whether such registration is valid,[377] or invalid.[378] However that may be, the second proviso shows that such misplaced entries will not operate as notice.[379]

(37) Record of Rights

Omission by a purchaser to inspect entries in the record of rights will, as already stated above, amount to wilful abstention from inquiry under the first part of the definition of notice.[380]

(38) Actual Possession as Notice of Title—Explanation II

Explanation II settles the law that actual possession is notice of such title as the person in actual possession has. It raises a statutory presumption of "notice" against any person who acquires any immovable property or any interest therein of the title, if any, of the person who is for the time being in actual possession thereof.[381]

In R K Mohammed Ubaidullah v Hajee C Abdul Wahab,[382] the Supreme Court has held:

> With reference to subsequent purchaser it is essential that he should make an inquiry as to the title or interest of the person in actual possession as on the date when the sale transaction was made in his favour. The actual possession of a person itself is deemed or constructive notice of the title if any, of a person who is for the time being in actual possession thereof. A subsequent purchaser has to make inquiry as to further interest, nature of possession and title under which the person was continuing in possession on the date of purchase of the property.

In Barnhart v Greenshields,[383] Lord Kingsdown delivering the judgment of the Board said:

> With respect to the effect of possession merely, we take the law to be, that if there be a tenant in possession of land, a purchaser is bound by all the equities which the tenant could enforce against the vendor, and that the equity of the tenant extends not only to interests connected with his tenancy, as in Taylor v Stibbert,[384] but also to interests under collateral agreements, as in Daniels v Davison[385] and Alien v Anthony,[386] the principle being the same in both classes of cases; namely, that the possession of the tenant is notice that he has some interest in the land, and that a purchaser having notice of that fact is bound, according to the ordinary rule, either to inquire what that interest is, or to give effect to it, whatever it may be.

A mortgagor contracted to sell the mortgaged property to the mortgagee who was in possession, and then sold it to a third person. The purchaser having made no inquiries, was held to have had constructive notice of all the equities in favour of the mortgagee.[387] Similarly, in Baburam Bag v Madhav Chandra,[388] Sir Lawrence Jenkins CJ said:

> the occupation of the property by a tenant ordinarily affects one who would take a transfer of the property with notice of that tenant's rights, and if he chooses to make no inquiry of the tenant, he cannot claim to be a transferee without notice.

A purchaser,[389] or a permanent lessee[390] of a village, is effected with notice of the rights of cultivating tenants about which he made no inquiry. In H N Narayanaswamy Naidy v Davveramma,[391] the vendor after executing a sale deed obtained an agreement for reconveyance of the property and while giving possession of the property to vendee, later entered into an agreement with him for the release of his rights under the agreement for re-conveyance. Subsequently, a "purchase" of the vendor's rights (under the agreement for reconveyance) was made by a person who was residing near the property in question. It was held by the Karnataka High Court that the subsequent purchaser would be deemed to have notice of the vendee's rights with reference to the agreement between the vendor and vendee.

Thus, in the case of unregistered sale deeds, the priority between buyers under interest, if any created by the unregistered sale deed is that the effect of possession under the first unregistered sale deed would terminate and prejudice the second buyer.[392]

Where a landlord has released the rent of a tenant and then mortgages the property leased, the possession of the tenant is constructive notice of the release and the mortgagee is not entitled to recover rent from the tenants; but a release after the mortgage is not binding on the mortgagee.[393] The first part of this proposition rests on the principle that the open possession of a tenant is notice, not only of the terms of the tenancy, but of collateral agreements as well, in the absence of all inquiry by the transferee.[394] Therefore, a notice of a tenant in possession, in the absence of inquiry, also constitutes constructive notice of the right of the tenant to claim part-performance under section 53-A.[395] However, a notice of tenancy is not notice of the tenant's equitable right to have the tenancy agreement rectified, as although the purchaser was bound to ascertain the terms under which the tenant held the land, he was under no duty to ascertain whether the terms accurately set out the bargain between the parties.[396]

Presumption of title from long possession will not apply against title holder

The maxim "possession follows title" is applicable in cases where proof of actual possession cannot reasonably be expected; for instance, in the case of waste lands, or where nothing is known about possession one way or another. Presumption of title as a result of possession, can arise only where facts disclose that no title vests in any party.[397]

Possession to operate as notice must be actual

In order to operate as constructive notice, possession must be actual possession.[398] Constructive possession is not notice, and the possession of a tenant is not notice of the title of the lessor,[399] unless the purchaser had learnt that the rent was in fact paid to him in a manner inconsistent with the title of the seller.[400]

Thus, if A contracts to sell land to B, and after B has put his tenant in possession, A sells the land to C, then the possession of B's tenant will not be sufficient to affect C with notice of B's interest.

It does not matter that the party in possession under a contract of sale had previously been in possession as tenant of the vendor, as the purchaser has no right to assume that the former tenant has not subsequently acquired another title.[401] On the other hand, if a purchaser finds his vendor in possession, he is not affected with notice that he is in possession, as tenant of a third party.[402]

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A leased his land on 2 March 1901 to B for seven years. On 1 May 1901, A entered into an agreement with B for the renewal of the lease on the termination of the term. On 11 July, A purported to settle the land with C for seven years from 1 May 1908. C sued to recover possession on the ground that the lease to B had terminated but the court held that C had constructive notice of the agreement as B was in possession and that C was not entitled to possession.[403]

(2) A leased his land to B, and then in 1875, sold it to him for ₹75 by an unregistered deed of sale. B, who was originally the tenant, continued in possession as owner. In 1876, A sold the land to C by a registered sale deed. C sued B for the rent alleging that B was in possession as tenant. Although C's deed being registered would have priority over B's unregistered deed, yet C is not entitled to rent because having notice of B's possession he had constructive notice of the title on which B held the land.[404]

(3) A sells land to B but remains in possession as tenant of B. The sale deed to B is unregistered, and A afterwards sells the same land to C by a registered deed. C is not deprived of the priority by the doctrine of notice, for he had no reason to suppose that A was in possession otherwise than as owner.[405]

Possession only of a portion where whole property sold

The rule depends upon the principle that when another is in exclusive possession of the property, and such possession would be prima facie inconsistent with the full rights of ownership of the vendor or mortgagor, and the purchaser does not choose to ask what that possession is, he must be taken to have got the information that he would have obtained if he had asked.[406] However, the doctrine must not be extended to the case of every person who may be on the premises; and possession of a small part of a house will not put a purchaser on constructive notice of that person's rights as to the whole house.[407] The principle of constructive notice thus, cannot be extended to a case where the person who claims on the basis of prior agreement is in possession of only a small fraction of the property. In such a case, it cannot be said that the person who purchases the property must make an inquiry about the previous contract from the plaintiff or any other tenant in occupation of a portion of the house.[408]

(39) State of the Property

A purchaser has been held to have notice of the rights of third parties from the state of the property purchased. Thus, the mortgagee of a burial ground has notice of the purposes to which it is devoted, and is bound by the rights of burial, temporary or in perpetuity, granted by his mortgagor, while left in possession.[409] If there is a shrine or tomb on the land to be sold, the purchaser will be put to an inquiry as to whether the land is a wakf.[410] Where a part of an estate, agreed to be let upon building leases was sold and the purchaser had notice of the existence of an archway, which, on the completion of the buildings was to be the only access to the adjoining land, it was held that the state of the property being such as to put the purchaser upon inquiry, he was fixed with constructive notice of the right of way.[411] However, the mere fact of there being windows in an adjoining house, which overlooked a purchased property, is not constructive notice of an agreement giving a right to the access of light to them, as windows are frequently made in situations where they are liable to be obstructed.[412]

(40) Notice to an Agent

Explanation III amends the law as to notice to an agent. Prior to the amending Act of 1929, the definition of notice included a provision that a person is said to have notice of a fact "when information of the fact is given or obtained by his agent under the circumstances mentioned in section 229 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The words "given or obtained" suggested express notice. In a case decided by Calcutta High Court[413] Pontifex J said "for a purchaser to be affected with constructive notice through his solicitor, the latter himself must have actual notice." The words "given or obtained" have been omitted, and the reference to the section of the Indian Contract Act deleted, and the definition widened so as to include a fact of which the agent has notice, whether express or constructive. This accords with the principle qui facit per alium facit per se, i.e., he who acts through another is deemed to act in person, and that the agent stands in the place of his principal with reference to the business for which he is agent so that his acts and knowledge are the acts and knowledge of his principal.[414]

The expression "imputed notice" was first used by Lord Chelmsford in the following passage from Espin v Pemberton:[415]

> Constructive notice properly so called, is the knowledge which the courts impute to a person upon a presumption so strong of the existence of the knowledge, that it cannot be allowed to be rebutted, either from his knowing something which ought to have put him upon further inquiry, or from his wilfully abstaining from inquiry, to avoid notice. I should therefore prefer calling the knowledge which a person has either by himself or through his agent, actual knowledge or if it is necessary to make a distinction between the knowledge which a person possesses himself, and that which is known to his agent, the latter might be called imputed knowledge.

The Privy Council has held that it is a rule of law that imputes the knowledge of the agent to the principal, as the agency extends to receiving notice, on behalf of the principal, of whatever is material.[416]

An alienation of the property by the father in whose favour a power of attorney has been executed by the son, would bind the latter[417] as it would squarely come under the expression "when a person is said to have notice" as interpreted under section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act and he would be deemed to have notice of the acts and transactions executed by his agent.

(41) Scope of the Rule as to Imputed Notice

The rule of imputed notice is subject to certain limitations. Notice should have been received by the agent (1) during the agency; (2) in his capacity as agent; (3) in the course of the agency business; (4) in a matter material to the agency business; and (5) should not have been fraudulently withheld from the principal. The first four conditions are implied by the words "whilst acting on his behalf in the course of the business to which that fact is material." The fifth condition is the subject of the proviso and will be considered separately.[418]

During the agency

It is essential that the knowledge should have been acquired by the agent, as agent and while acting in the agency business. Thus, if a canvasser for an insurance company negotiates a policy of insurance for a man who has lost the sight of one eye, against the loss of both eyes; the knowledge obtained by the canvasser, when acting as agent of the company, that the man had already lost one eye, will be imputed to the company.[419] Knowledge obtained before the commencement of the agency will not be imputed to the principal. A mortgagee is not held to have notice of prior charges because his solicitor had previously acted for the prior encumbrancers.[420] In Chabildas Lalloobhai v Dayai Mowji,[421] a mortgagee sold the property mortgaged under a power of sale, and one of the conditions of the sale was a depreciatory condition wholly unwarranted by the state of the mortgagor's title. The purchaser signed the contract the same day, and a few days later employed a solicitor to act for him in the preparation of a conveyance. The High Court set aside the sale on the ground that the solicitor knew enough about the title to see that the condition was unjustifiable. The Privy Council, however, said that this view imputed to the principal the knowledge of an agent not acquired in the business for which he was agent, and to use it to upset a transaction at the date the agency commenced, was an extension of the doctrine of constructive notice with which the Council could not concur. Knowledge acquired by an agent after the agency has terminated, cannot be imputed to the principal.

In his capacity as agent

It is necessary that the transaction should be such as to constitute the relation of principal and agent. It has been held that notice to the agent of a country solicitor is notice to the person employing the solicitor.[422] On the other hand, if a mortgagee allows a mortgagor-solicitor to endorse the deed of mortgage, he does not constitute the solicitor his agent, and is not affected with knowledge of an encumbrance known to him.[423] Where company A lends money to company B, and if a director of company A is by reason of a personal interest in company B aware that the loan is required for an ultra vires purpose, that knowledge will not be imputed to company A, as the director is under no duty to disclose how the money borrowed would be applied.[424] However, if a director in his personal capacity has notice of a charge on shares of the company, that will amount to notice to the company.[425] Similarly, if a director charges his own shares, notice of the charge will be imputed to the company.[426]

In the course of the agency business

Employment of a solicitor in one transaction will not make him an agent for receiving notice in a subsequent transaction.[427] Where the purchaser employed the same solicitor as the vendor, and the solicitor had heard of certain restrictions in the course of his previous employment by the vendor, notice of the restrictions was not imputed to the purchaser since his solicitor would not have discovered them if he had investigated title in the usual way.[428]

Material to the business

The knowledge must, of course, be material to the business for which the agent is employed. It is not a part of the duty of an agent to acquire knowledge of a fact which is not material to the business of the agency, nor would it be his duty, if he did acquire such knowledge, to communicate it to his principal.[429]

Ratification

If a principal ratifies the act of an agent, notice to the agent will be imputed as notice to the principal, as the effect of the ratification is to constitute the agent an agent ab initio.[430]

Communication by agent not necessary

That the knowledge of the agent is knowledge of the principal has been said by the Privy Council to be a rule of law and an inference of fact.[431] In the absence of fraud, it does not matter that there has been no communication by the agent.[432] In Kettlewell v Watson,[433] Fry LJ said:

> The court, therefore, receives evidence of the agency and it receives evidence of the act of the principal, but it will not receive evidence whether the agent recollected the fact at the time, or whether he communicated it to his principal. It deals with those matters by way of irrebutable presumption when the circumstances are known.

The Privy Council has taken the same view.[434]

(42) Proviso as to Imputed Notice: Fraudulent Concealment of Fact by Agent

Fraud on the part of the agent exempts the principal from the rule of imputed notice. Such conduct raises a necessary presumption that the notice has not been communicated, as a fraudulent person will never communicate it to one of his victims. In Cave v Cave,[435] it is pointed out by Fry LJ that this exception has been based on two grounds:

> (1) that the act done by the agent is such as cannot be said to be done by him in his character of agent, but is done by him in the character of a party to an independent fraud on his principal, and that it is not to be imputed to the principal as an act done by his agent; and

(2) that circumstances raised the inevitable conclusion that the notice had not been communicated.

In the case already cited,[436] Lord Wrenbury (then Buckley J) said:

> I understand the law to be this: that if a communication be made to an agent which it would be his duty to hand on to his principals, and if the agent has an interest which would lead him not to disclose to his principals the information which he has thus obtained, and in point of tact he does not communicate it, you are not to impute to his principals knowledge by reason of the fact that their agent knew something which it was not in his interest to disclose and which he did not disclose.

This passage was cited with approval by the judicial committee in Texas Co Ltd v Bombay Banking Co.[437] In that case, V who was an agent of the bank, had an overdraft in his private banking account which he discharged with money belonging to the Texas Company, who were his principals in an oil business. It was contended that as V was agent of the bank, knowledge of the ownership of the money should be imputed to the bank. However, Lord Buckmaster said:

> It would be straining the doctrine of notice beyond all reasonable limits to hold that in such circumstances moneys received in absolute good faith should be earmarked with some independent ownership, because the debtor, who was also a servant of the company committed a fraud in order to discharge his obligations.

Where a party has connived with the agent and information has been fraudulently withheld from the principal by the agent, he cannot take advantage of his fraud and impute notice to the principal. A common solicitor of both parties colluding with one does not affect the other with notice, "for it would be an encouragement of fraud to apply the rules of notice which were established for the safety of mankind to a transaction like this; it would be sanctioning a scheme to rob a man by colluding with his solicitor".[438]

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A solicitor, CC, who was trustee of a settlement, purchased with the trust money, land in the name of his brother FC. The brother, FC, mortgaged it to a mortgagee who employed CC, as his solicitor. The mortgagee was no party to the fraud and was not affected with the knowledge of the trust which his solicitor possessed.[439]

(2) A solicitor acts for a husband and wife seeking to mortgage the wife's property, which is in fact caught by a covenant to settle. He also acts for the intending mortgagee. The solicitor, who has notice of the covenant, tells the mortgagors that he will not disclose it to the mortgagee. The mortgagee is not affected with constructive notice of the covenant.[440]

The exception of fraud, however, will not altogether exclude the doctrine of imputed notice, and if the agent is a fraudulent solicitor, notice will be imputed of anything which an honest solicitor, employed in the place of the fraudulent solicitor, would have discovered in the ordinary course of the business of the agency. In Kennedy v Green,[441] a lady was mortgagee of leasehold property belonging to her solicitor who fraudulently obtained her signature to an assignment of the mortgage to himself. He then raised money on a mortgage of the same property as unencumbered leasehold to another client

K. The assignment by the lady to the solicitor was drawn in an informal and irregular manner, which would have excited the suspicion of a professional man, and so money was paid to her. It was held that though K could not be deemed to have notice of the fraud of, yet if an independent solicitor had been employed, an examination of the deed signed by the lady would have at once shown the suspicious character of the transaction. K was, therefore, affected with notice that consideration had not been paid, on the ground that the deed and the endorsed receipt thereon, were drawn in a peculiar form. As Lord Brougham LC said:

> For Bostock, had he been wholly free from the guilty knowledge and only employed as a solicitor to act for and advice Mr Kirby must on seeing the deed, have had his attention at once called to the suspicious circumstances under which it was executed.

In this case the fraud was in the obtaining of the deed. There was no attempt to conceal it from K

Synopsis

(1) Amendment 54
(2) Contract Act 54
Difference between contract and transfer 55
(3) Registration Act 55
(4) Supplemental 56

(1) Amendment

The only amendment made by the amending Act 20 of 1929 was to change the year of the Registration Act from 1877 to 1908. However, even before this amendment, the reference to the Registration Act, 1877, was by virtue of the General Clauses Act, 1907, construed as referring to the Act of 1908.

The second para was added by the amending Act 3 of 1885.

(2) Contract Act

The reference to the Indian Contract Act, 1872 is explained by the following passage from the report of the Indian Law Commission on 15 November 1879:

> We would declare that all chapters and sections of the bill which relate to contracts should be taken as part of the Contract Act, 1872. When the body of substantive civil law for India is arranged in a more compact and convenient form than that of a series of fragmentary portions from time to time passed by the Legislature, the chapters of Sale, Mortgage, Lease and Exchange, contained, in the present Bill, will probably be placed in close connection with the rules contained in the Contract Act. But till then they may fitly be left in a law containing what the Contract Act does not contain, namely, general rules regulating the transmission of property between living persons.

442. Added by Act 3 of 1885, sec. 3.
443. Subs. by Act 20 of 1929, sec. 5, for "1877".

The Indian Succession Act and the Indian Contract Act had been passed before the TP Act, and, as already stated in the notes to the preamble, one of the objects of the TP Act was to bring the rules which regulate the transmission of property between living persons into harmony with the law of testamentary and intestate succession, and to complete the code of contract so far as relates to immovable property.[444] The provisions of TP Act complete the law of contract, as most transfers of property are executed contracts.

In deciding whether a party to a transfer has performed his obligations, the court must consider his obligations under the contract.[445]

Difference between contract and transfer

The section says that the chapters and sections of TP Act which relate to contracts are to be taken as part of the Indian Contract Act. Thus, the word "consideration," wherever it occurs in the TP Act, is used in the same sense as in the Indian Contract Act.[446] Section 137 of TP Act must be read as part of the Indian Contract Act.[447] However, it must be observed that the section does not say that the provisions of the Indian Contract Act are to be read in for the TP Act. There is a clear distinction between a completed conveyance and an executed contract.[448] Therefore, a conveyance or completed transfer cannot be rescinded under section 39 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and a mortgagee being a transferee of an interest in property is entitled to enforce his mortgage for the amount he has advanced, although he has failed to advance the whole amount of the mortgage money.[449]

This distinction has been recognised in decisions in Tatia's case, Rashik Lal's case and Dip Narain Singh v Nageshar,[450] approved by the Supreme Court in State of Kerala v Cochin Refineries[451] where the Supreme Court held that a mortgage was valid even though no part of the mortgage-money had been advanced.

(3) Registration Act

The Registration Act, 1908 (Registration Act) makes registration optional in the case of immovable property of the value of less than ₹100. Thus, while under the Registration Act a sale or mortgage for ₹99 need not be registered, yet under TP Act such a sale (section 54) or mortgage (section 59) may be made either by a registered instrument or by delivery of the property. Similarly, while under the Registration Act, a lease of immovable property other than a lease from year to year, or for a term exceeding one year, or reserving a yearly rent need not be registered, yet under TP Act, such a lease (section 107) may be made either by a registered instrument, or by oral agreement accompanied by the delivery of possession. Similarly, while under the Registration Act a gift of movable property need not be registered, yet under TP Act such gift (section 123) may either be made by a registered instrument, or by delivery. This inconsistency between the Registration Act and the TP Act was noticed by Garth CJ[452] and the intention of the amending Act of 1885 was to remove this difficulty, and to make the provisions of the TP Act as to registration absolute.[453] Thus, although equitable mortgages are recognised in the Punjab, yet when section 59 (prior to its amendment in 1929) was applied to an area in the Punjab, the requisition for registration became absolute and an equitable mortgage could no longer be accepted in that area, if the amount secured was not less than ₹100.[454]

(4) Supplemental

It will be observed that while parts of the TP Act are to be "taken as part of the Indian Contract Act" and are thus, incorporated in it, the provision as to the Registration Act is differently expressed, as the specified sections are to be "read as supplemental to the Registration Act." It had been held that the effect of the provision as to the Registration Act was merely to add to the list of documents which are compulsorily registrable. It did not go to the length of saying that these supplementary documents were deemed to be included in section 17 of the Registration Act. The provisions of section 49 of the Registration Act, rendering an unregistered document, of which registration is compulsory under section 17, inadmissible as evidence of any transaction affecting such property, were held not to apply to documents in this supplementary list. This was the view taken by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Sohan Lal v Mohan Lal[455] by Macleod CJ in Dawal v Dharma,[456] and by a majority of judges in a decision of Full Bench of the Madras High Court.[457] However, this view seems to be over astute, and to attribute to the different expressions used in the two paragraphs of the section a meaning, which was not intended. The difference of language is probably only due to the difference of subject matter. Parts of the TP Act refer to contracts and these parts might be described as to be "taken as part of the Indian Contract Act"; whereas, a similar expression would not have been appropriate to an extraneous subject like the Registration Act. Those decisions, however, have now been superseded by legislation, as the Act 21 of 1929 by inserting in section 49 of the Registration Act the words "or by any provision of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882," has made it clear that documents in the supplementary list, i.e., documents of which registration is necessary under the TP Act but not under the Registration Act, fall within the scope of section 49, and if not registered are not admissible as evidence of any transaction affecting any property comprised therein, and do not affect any such property.[458]

From a combined reading of sections 4 and 54 of the TP Act and, section 17 of the Registration Act, as applicable to the state of Uttar Pradesh, and as amended by Uttar Pradesh Act 57 of 1976, it is clear that every contract of sale of an immovable property shall be made only by a registered instrument.[459]

CHAPTER 2

Of Transfers of Property by Act of Parties

Sections 5 – 53A, Transfer of Property Act, 1882

(A) Transfer of Property, whether moveable or immoveable

5. "Transfer of property" defined.—In the following sections "transfer of property" means an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future, to one or more other living persons, or to himself, [1][or to himself[and one or more other living persons; and "to transfer property" is to perform such act.

[2][In this section "living person" includes a company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not, but nothing herein contained shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to transfer of property to or by companies, associations or bodies of individuals.]

(1) Amendment

The section has been amended by the Act of 1929.

(2) Scope

Transfer of Property has been defined in section 5 of the TP Act meaning "an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future to one or more other living persons and "to transfer property" is to perform such act".

"Living person" has been defined to include a company or association or body of individuals whether incorporated or not, but nothing herein contained shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to the transfer of property to or by companies, associations or bodies of individuals.[3]

(3) Property

The legislature has not attempted to define the word "property", but it is used in TP Act in its widest and most generic legal sense.[4] Section 6 says that "property of any kind may be transferred". Thus, an actionable claim is property;[5] and so is a right to a re-conveyance of land.[6]

Property is not only the thing which is the subject-matter of ownership, but includes also dominium or the right or ownership or of partial ownership, and as Lord Langdale said it is the most comprehensive of all terms which can be used inasmuch as it is indicative and descriptive of every possible interest which the party can have.[7] It is used in this dual sense of the thing and the right of the thing in section 54 which contrasts, "tangible immovable property" with "a reversion or other intangible thing". Property includes rights such as trademarks, copyrights, patents and personal rights capable of transfer or transmission such as debts. In English real property law, the distinction between tangible and intangible things is expressed as corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. A share in the company is a movable property freely alienable in absence of any express restrictions under the articles of association of the company, and the vendee of the shares cannot be denied the registration of the shares purchased by him on a ground other than stated in the articles.[8]

It has been observed by J Bhagwati in Jugalkishore v Raw Cotton Co[9] that the words "in present or in future" in section 5 qualify the word "conveys" and not the word "property". A transfer of property not in existence operates as a contract to be performed in the future, which is specifically enforceable as soon as the property comes into existence. Where the operative portion of the sale deed recorded that all rights and privileges in and concerning the property either in present, or accruing in future as vesting in the vendor were the subject matter of the sale, and that the vendor retained no right of any kind, it was held that even the right of the vendor of reconveyance of the property was transferred by the sale deed.[10]

(4) Interests in Property

As ownership consists of a bundle of rights, the various rights and interests may be vested in different persons, eg. a mortgagor and a mortgagee, a lessor and a lessee, or a tenant for life and a remainder man. Absolute ownership is an aggregate of component rights such as the right of possession, the right of enjoying the usufruct of the land, and so on.[11]

These subordinate rights, the aggregate of which make up absolute ownership, are referred in the TP Act as interests in property; and in English law, real rights. A transfer of property is either a transfer of absolute ownership, or a transfer of one or more of these subordinate rights such as a right to transfer of possession.[12] In section 58, however, the word interest is not distinguished from absolute ownership. With reference to an English mortgage it is used to express an absolute interest, i.e., ownership which is not the less absolute because it is subject to a covenant to reconvey.

The term interest is not defined in the Act. In P Ramanatha Aiyar's, The Law Lexicon, the term "interest" is explained thus:

> Legal concern, right, pecuniary stake, the legal concern of a person in the thing or property or in the right to some of the benefits or use from which the property is inseparable; such a right in or to a thing capable of being possessed or enjoyed as property which can be enforced by judicial proceedings. The word is capable of different meanings, according to the context in which it is used or the subject-matter to which it is applied. It may have even the same meaning as the phrase "right title and interest" but it has been said also to mean any right in the nature of property, but less than title. The word is sometimes employed synonymous with estate, or property.

The Supreme Court in Zelia M Xavier Fernandes E Gonsalves v Joana Rodrigues,[13] held that the word "interest" has a basic meaning of participation in advantage, profit and responsibility. "Interest" is a right, title or share in a thing. If a right of fishing is an interest in an immoveable property, it may be said with greater force that a right to rear and appropriate lac from lac bearing trees is an interest in immoveable property.[14]

A mortgage is a transfer of an interest in specific immoveable property, and what the mortgagee acquires under the transaction is a mortgagee's interest in specific immoveable property which can only be immoveable property and not moveable property.[15]

(5) Future Interests in Property: Reversion and Remainder

Some interests in property are future, and are called in English law reversions and remainders. A reversion is the residue of an original estate which is left after the grantor has granted a smaller estate. Thus, the interest of a lessor is a reversion, a future estate pending the termination of a lease. A remainder is an interest granted out of the original estate at the same time as, but in succession to a precedent interest. Thus, if an estate is granted to A for life and then to B, the estate of B is the remainder, and the estate of A is the particular estate which supports it. The terms "reversion" and "remainder" are commonly used in judgments of the courts in India. The act uses the word "reversion" in section 54, but it occurs nowhere else in the TP Act, not even in the chapter dealing with leases. The word "remainder" does not occur in the TP Act, but in section 13 the phrase "remaining interest" is used instead. A vested remainder is capable of being attached,[16] and so is a contingent interest.[17]

(6) Legal and Equitable Estates

English law recognizes other interests which are not created by transfer or grant. Thus, in a trust of land the legal estate is in the trustee, and the interest of the cestui que trust or beneficiary is an interest in land called the equitable interest, or equitable estate. Similarly, an agreement for the sale of land leaves the legal estate in the seller, but creates an equitable estate in the buyer.

The law in India recognizes no distinction between legal and equitable estates.[18] In Webb v Mac Pherson,[19] the Privy Council said:

> The law of India, speaking broadly, knows nothing of that distinction between legal and equitable property in the sense in which it was understood when equity was administered by the Court of Chancery in England.

And in a still later case,[20] their Lordships said:

> By that law (the law of India), therefore, there can be but one "owner", and where the property is vested in a trustee, the "owner" must, their Lordships think, be the trustee. This is the view embodied in the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, sections 3, 55, 56, etc.

The interest of the beneficiary of a trust is defined in section 3 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 not as an interest in the trust property, but as a right against the trustee as owner of the trust property. Where the trust and the educational institutions started by trust were separate entities, and the property was not the trust property but the property belonging to the educational institution, there would be no bar to transfer such property and the property can be validly transferred.[21]

The mere expectation as to or likelihood of conveyance of title, however well founded does not create any interest in the property.[22] Similarly, a contract of sale does not, of itself, create any interest in, or charge on, the property. This is expressly declared in section 54 of TP Act, while the fiduciary character of the personal obligation created by a contract for sale is recognised in section 2 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, and in section 91 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882.

The personal obligation created by a contract of sale is described in section 40 as an obligation arising out of contract and annexed to the ownership of property, but not amounting to an interest or easement therein. The section further enacts that the obligation cannot be enforced against a transferee for consideration without notice. Section 63 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 similarly enacts that the rights of a beneficiary of a trust cannot be enforced against a transferee in good faith without notice of the trust.

Therefore, these personal rights resemble the equitable estate or interest of the cestui que trust, and of the person who has agreed to purchase in English law, in that they are liable to be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice. The rule against perpetuity which applies to equitable estates in English law has sometimes been applied to these personal rights by way of analogy. This, it is submitted, is a mistake as explained in the notes to section 14.

(7) Transfer

The word "transfer" is defined with reference to the word "convey". This word in English law in its narrower and more usual sense refers to the transfer of an estate in land; but it is sometimes used in a much wider sense to include any form of an assurance inter vivos. The word 'conveys' in section 5 of the TP Act is used in the wider sense referred to above. Transferor must have an interest in the property. He cannot sever himself from it and yet convey it.[23] A lease comes within the meaning of the word "transfer".[24] A transfer of property or creation of an interest may be accompanied by conditions, covenants or restraints, unless there is some provision of law which annuls or invalidates such conditions, restraint or limitation.[25]

There is a discernible difference between a case of settlement of property with reservation of a benefit to the settlor on the one hand, and the case where what is settled is only a share or interest or part of the property—excluding the part of the share corresponding to the benefit that the settlor has chosen to retain. In the latter case, there is no transfer at all.[26]

A registered settlement deed cannot be cancelled by executing a cancellation deed. If at all the said document is to be cancelled, it has to be done under the provisions of Specific Relief Act, by approaching a competent civil court for cancellation of such document.[27] Thus, where a registered sale deed is executed in favour of the transferee for the mining lease with full consent of the owner, the Mines Commissioner is not empowered to pass orders negating the same.[28] A "transfer of property" as defined in the present section does not necessarily involve the execution of an instrument of transfer or conveyance. In the case of movables and generally in the case of immovable property of a value of less than ` 100, a transfer may be effected by delivery of possession. Leases other than leases from year to year or for a time exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent, may be made by oral agreement accompanied by delivery of possession. The fundamental rule is that a transfer cannot be effected in any way not prescribed by the TP Act.[29]

The definition of transfer of property in this section does not exclude property situated outside India or in the territories to which the TP Act does not apply. It does not matter that the property is situated outside India, or in the territories where the TP Act does not apply;[30] for if the transfer is effected where the TP Act is in force, the rights of the parties are to be determined by the court under the TP Act leaving it to the party affected to prove that by the

lex rei sitae, i.e., by the law of the land where the property is situated, the transaction is invalid or defective.[31]

If legislative intent of an enactment is to give an extended meaning to the expression transfer, it need not be confined to the statutory concept of transfer under section 5 of the TP Act. Section 71-A of the Chhotanagpur Tenancy Act contemplated that where possession has passed from one to another and as a physical fact the member of the scheduled tribe who is entitled to hold possession has lost it and a non-member has come into possession, would be covered by transfer. The Supreme Court held that it was not proper to confine the meaning of transfer in section 71-A to transfer as defined in section 5 of the TP Act.[32] Thus the occupancy rights of a tribal cannot be transferred or even bequeathed by any tribal to a non tribal in view of the restriction under section 73 AA of the Bombay Land Revenue Code or section 63 of Bombay Tenancy Act.[33]

Auction Sale

Section 5 does not apply in respect of the property sold in auction sale.[34]

Transfer by or on behalf of the government

The provisions of the Transfer of Property Act shall not be applicable to any grant or other transfer of land or of any interest therein to be made by or on behalf of the Government.[35]

Charge

A charge is not a transfer of property, for in a charge no right in rem is transferred, but a personal obligation is created—a jus ad rem or a right to payment out of the property specified.[36] In the Insolvency Acts, a transfer of property is, however, defined as including a charge.[37] That definition is wider because any obligation incurred by a debtor affecting his property may be voidable as a fraudulent preference.[38]

Compromise

A compromise of doubtful rights is not a transfer, but is based on the assumption that there was an antecedent title of some kind in the parties which the agreement acknowledged and defined.[39] The position would be different if such a compromise also transferred properties to a person who has neither a pre-existing title, nor a claim to such title.[40]

Deed of Appointment

A transfer is not necessarily contractual, and included a deed of appointment.[41] The section does not require that the "living person" who conveys should necessarily be the same person as he who owns, or owned, the property conveyed. All that is required is that there should be an act of conveyance by some living person; under the section, there may be a transfer by a person exercising powers over the property of another. Thus, where the donee of a power of appointment, having power to appoint a beneficial interest in the property, exercises that power, it would amount to a transfer.[42]

Power of Attorney

A General Power of Attorney (GPA)/WILL or Special Power of Attorney (SA) does not ipso facto constitute an instrument of transfer of an immovable property. GPA Sales or Sale Agreement or Will transfers' are creation of an agency whereby the grantor authorizes the grantee to do the acts specified therein, on behalf of grantor, which when executed will be binding on the grantor as if done by him. It is revocable or terminable at any time unless it is made irrevocable in a manner known to law. Even an irrevocable attorney does not have the effect of transferring title to the grantee.[43] A power of attorney given by a fisherman co-operative society to another to manage fishery does not create an interest in the property and therefore would not amount to transfer.[44] The fixing of different rates of stamp duty when a Power of Attorney is executed in favour of blood relative as against in favour of outsider as agent is not unconstitutional. It is to curb tendency of transferring immovable properties through Power of Attorney and inappropriate documentation and levy of stamp duty on such ostensible documents, whose real intention is to transfer immovable property.[45]

Easement and licence

The creation of an easement[46] or a right under a licence[47] does not involve a transfer.

Exchange

Family Arrangement

It has been held by the Supreme Court that a family arrangement, like a compromise, is "based on the assumption that there is an antecedent title of some sort in the parties and the agreement acknowledges and defines what that title is, each party relinquishing all claims to property other than that falling to his share and recognising the right of the others, as they had previously asserted it, to the portions allotted to them respectively".[49] It is not necessary that every party taking a benefit under such a settlement must be shown to have, under the law, a share in the property; it is enough if they have a possible claim or even, if they are related, a semblance of a claim.[50] It may in certain cases include non family members as well.[51] In absence of proof of details of family settlement and any consideration paid in lieu of such settlement, no title can be claimed.[52] If, however, there is no real dispute or claim at all, the transaction might amount to a transfer.[53] Such an arrangement is not a transfer, and requires no conveyance to pass the title. This, of course, only applies to parties to the arrangement and to persons claiming under them.[54] A deed of family settlement is not required to be compulsorily registered even where it has been reduced to writing and would be admissible in evidence where it was already acted upon by the parties, who acknowledged the antecedent title,[55] but a mere caption of family arrangement given to the document is not decisive to exempt it from registration. The contents of such document are to be read as a whole to determine whether it is a family arrangement.[56] A family arrangement cannot override the mode of devolution as reflected in the will indicating the manner of disposition of the property.[57] Further, if the legal claims are settled by bona fide family arrangement which is fair and equitable, the same is final and binding on the parties.[58] A memorandum of understanding actuated by desire to resolve disputes can be treated as family settlement.[59] In M N Aryamurthy v M D Subbaraya Setty,[60] the Supreme Court laid down three requirements for a family arrangement. In the first place, there must be an agreement amongst the various members of the family intended to be generally and reasonably for the benefit of the family. Secondly, the agreement should be with the object either of compromising doubtful or disputed rights, or for preserving the family property, or the peace and security of the family by avoiding litigation or for saving its honour. Thirdly, being an agreement, there is consideration for the same, the consideration being the expectation that such an agreement or settlement will result in establishing or ensuring amity and good-will amongst the relations. Where the parents had distributed their property under a deed of settlement in 2005 and the plaintiff had enjoyed the property under this settlement and even alienated some of it, his challenge to the family settlement nine years after having benefitted from it on the ground that it was invalid would be not only barred by limitation but would also not be tenable in court.[61] In Saroj Kumari Bandyopadhyay v State of West Bengal,[62] a mother who was member of a co-operative society transferred property in favour of the son, and the son became member of this society after the acquisition of the land by the society. A notification stipulated that the benefit in it would not be available to the subsequent purchaser of the property from a member. It was held that transfer of share by mother to the son, not by way of succession is transfer inter vivos and is not compulsorily registrable therefore such assignment is not a transfer for the purposes of notification and the son, not being a subsequent purchaser is entitled to benefits under notification.

Partition

A partition is not actually a transfer of property, but is analogous to an exchange. Justice Mookerjee, in a case decided by Calcutta High Court,[63] said that partition signifies the surrender of a portion of a joint right in exchange for a similar right from the other co-sharer to co-sharers.[64]

It effects a change in the mode of enjoyment of property, but is not an act of conveying property from one living person to another.[65] It is only renouncement of existing rights in common properties in consideration of getting exclusive right and possession over the specific plots.[66] Partition is only a process of mutual renunciation by which common unspecified rights in larger extents are converted into exclusive right over specific plots.[67] Partition is really a process, in and by which a joint enjoyment is transformed into an enjoyment severally. Each one of the co-sharers had an antecedent title and, therefore, no conveyance is involved in the process, as the conferment of a new title is not necessary.[68] In Sarin v Poplai[69] CJ Gajendragadkar has observed that "the true effect of partition is that each coparcener gets a specific property in lieu of his undivided right in respect of the totality of the property of the family". The Supreme Court in that case was considering the provisions of a Rent Control Act, and did not express any opinion on the correctness of certain decisions[70] holding that a partition is a transfer within the meaning of section 53. The correct view, it is submitted, is that a partition is not a transfer, and therefore, strictly not governed by the TP Act, but that many of the provisions of the TP Act may govern partition as embodying rules of justice, equity and good conscience.[71]

In some cases,[72] it has been held that a partition amounts to a transfer of property; in other cases however, it has been held that a partition is not transfer of property.[73] Partition of property does not amount to "transfer" as contemplated by section 5. Doctrine of part performance, therefore, does not apply to partition,[74] but a case of partition is covered by section 109, as embodying a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.[75]

A partition is possible between two co-owners who may not have absolute or equal rights, but are limited owners. A document executed in settlement of disputes between two persons who are entitled to the same properties and who agree to divide the properties amongst themselves is a partition, and not a settlement.[76]

Where a joint family property is subject to mortgage, there is no transfer of ownership and the coparceners, being its lawful owners, are competent to allot the mortgaged property in an oral partition to any of the coparceners, particularly when such oral partition is not going to interfere with the scheme of the mortgage.[77] The coparceners to whom the mortgaged property is allotted, becomes its absolute owner and is entitled to redeem the mortgage. Consequently, where the right to redeem is transferred by that coparcener, the transferee is also entitled to redeem the mortgage.

Partition Act

The definition of transfer in this section is not applicable to the Partition Act, where it simply means a change of ownership.[78]

Document transferring plant and machinery

Whether the transfer of plant and machinery fastened to the earth reported to be in a removable condition, when the transferor had no right to title to the land and the transferee having not acquired any interest in the land by reason of such transfer, could be defined as immovable property, was a question which was posed before the Allahabad High Court. It was held that the document regarding such conveyance is a transfer within the meaning of section 5 of the TP Act.[79]

Razinama and Kabulayet in Collector's books

The effect of a razinama and kabulayet in the Collector's books has been the subject of conflicting decisions, but the better opinion is that it is not necessarily evidence of an intention to transfer, and that its effect depends upon the circumstances of each case.[80]

Entries in revenue records

Entries in the revenue records is neither a proof of title upon the property nor can it be used as a camouflage to defeat the legal right, title or interest of a person, who is the owner of the property in question. Revenue entries neither can confer a title nor can it extinguish the right or title of the owner of the property. Mutation of the property in the revenue record also does not create or extinguish title nor has it any presumptive value on title. It only enables the person in whose favour mutation is ordered to pay land revenue in question. Thus, the correct proof of ownership is a registered sale deed in favour of a person. Revenue entries or revenue receipts have nothing to do with the ownership and they cannot be treated as a conclusive evidence of the ownership of the property.[81]

Recitals

Recitals in deeds of mortgage and in petitions to officials do not, of course, amount to a transfer.[82] Where a partner contributed towards the capital of the firm by bringing in shares held by him in a company, then it is a "transfer" within section 45, Income Tax Act, 1961. To the extent to which exclusive interest is reduced to a shared interest, there is a transfer of interest.[83]

Release Deed

If the person executing the release deed holds some right, title or interest in the property, release of that interest would amount to conveyance. However, if the transferor is a benamidar releasing the property to the real owner, it is not conveyance.[84]

Dissolution of Partnership

Division of assets following dissolution of partnership firm does not amount to a transfer. Where there is no assigned or definite share in the property of the firm of the partners and shares are assigned on dissolution of the firm, such dissolution and division of shares would not amount to a transfer within the meaning of this section.[85] However, in absence of any prescribed terms and conditions barring transfer, securities concerned (OFCDs) are transferable and hence marketable.[86]

Relinquishment

A relinquishment is not an alienation,[87] unless an intention to transfer is found to exist, as when it is in favour of a person having no interest.[88] A registered instrument styled as a release deed releasing the right, title and interest of the executant in the property in favour of the release for valuable consideration may operate as a conveyance.[89]

Where the person in whose favour the "release" is executed gets rights by virtue of the release, the deed may amount to a transfer. Thus, in a case decided by Madras High Court, by a deed of release, the releasor, after getting a sum of money from the person in whose favour release was executed, transferred his right, title and interest in half share of the suit properties absolutely in favour of the latter. The document could not be construed merely as enlarging the right of the latter, but gave him an absolute right in the half share which belonged to the releasor. Hence, it clearly comes under the definition of "transfer" in section 5, and suit to set aside the document as "fraudulent" will come only under section 53 of the TP Act.[90]

Surrender

A surrender is not a transfer of property as defined in this section.[91] It is the falling of a lesser estate into a greater one.[92]

A deed of surrender simpliciter cannot affect any transfer of title.[93]

In the case of surrender by a life tenant in favour of a remainder man, there is no transfer of property. There is merely an effacement or extinguishment of the rights of the former, and an acceleration of the rights of the remainder man. The latter's right are derived from the document executed by the full owner, and when a deed of surrender is executed, full rights accrue to the remainder man in pursuance of the title derived under the settlement, and not from or through the life tenant who makes the surrender.[94]

Will

These words exclude transfers by will, for a will operates from the death of the testator.[95] A deed executed by husband and wife jointly providing that on the death of either of them, the survivor would retain all rights over the property including that of alienation and upon the death of the surviving executants the property would go to their children would be a will (and not a settlement deed) as there is no transfer of a right in praesenti on the other executants.[96] Transfer of share or interest in a co-operative society to the nominee of its member operating on his death would also be excluded like transfers by will.[97] Where the beneficiary is not a living person, the expression used is the creation of an interest in an unborn person contemplated under section 13. A Muslim gentleman executed a document styled as "will". By this document, he divided certain properties amongst his daughter and nephew in his life-time and gave possession to the persons named. It was held that it was a conveyance and not a will, even though it described the beneficiaries as "heirs". Not being a registered document, it was invalid.[98]

(8) Living Person

Corporation

The words "living person" include a juristic person such as a corporation company or association of persons or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not, have been included amongst "living person" in this section.[99] A court is not a juristic person.[100]

The second paragraph has been added by the Amendment Act of 1929 in order to make it clear that the words embrace companies and societies, and that the general provisions of TP Act as to transfer do not affect the special provisions of the Companies Act.[101]

An idol

An idol or God, is a juristic person capable of holding property,[102] but it is not a living person.[103] Likewise a temple is also not a living person.[104] An idol not being a living person, a dedication of land to an idol does not fall within the terms of section 122, and need not be made in writing or by a registered instrument under section 123 of TP Act.[105] It has also been said that an idol is only the symbol of the deity, and that it would be contrary to the Hindu religion that a deity should make an acceptance of worldly goods.[106]

Wakf

These decisions must be distinguished from a decision of Allahabad High Court where it was held that a Mahomedan wakf, which is a dedication of property to God, is voidable at the option of creditors, if made with intent to defraud creditors, under section 53 of the TP Act, there being no rule of Mahomedan law inconsistent with the provisions of that section.[107]

(9) In Present or in Future

A transfer of property may take place not only in present, but also in the future,[108] but the property must be in existence. The words "in present or in future" qualify the word "conveys", and not the word "property".[109] A transfer of property that is not in existence operates as a contract to be performed in the future which may be specifically enforced as soon as the property comes into existence.[110] In Rajah Sahib Perhlad v Budhoo,[111] the Privy Council said:

> But how can there be any transfer, actual or constructive, upon a contract under which the vendor sells that of which he has not possession, and to which he may never establish a title? The bill of sale in such a case can only be evidence of a contract to be performed in future, and upon the happening of a contingency, of which the purchaser may claim a specific performance, if he comes into court showing that he has himself done all that he was bound to do.

The Supreme Court in Bharat Nidhi's case held that as soon as the property comes into existence and is capable of being identified, equity taking as done that which ought to be done fastens upon the property, and the contract to assign thus becomes a complete equitable assignment.[112]

It has been held that a transfer of non-existent or, as it is conveniently called, after-acquired property, provided it is not of the nature contemplated in section 6(a), is perfectly valid and is to be regarded in a court as a contract to transfer after the vendor acquires the title, and will fasten upon the property as soon as the vendor acquires it.[113] While it is true that the law of India does not recognise equitable assignment or equitable estate, it is difficult to say that the right of the transferee in such circumstances is a purely personal right which can only be enforced under section 18(a) of the Specific Relief Act or by a suit for damages, as upon such a transfer or afterwards acquiring the property, an obligation undoubtedly attaches to the property under section 40, and the transfer also operates under section 43 on the interest acquired by the transferor.[114]

The interest of the transferee, however, may not prevail against a bona fide transferee for value.

A mortgage of a future crop has been recognised, but such a mortgage will not affect a transferee without notice.[115]

Transfer of a chance of receiving a gratuitous payment at the discretion of an employer for services being or about to be rendered consists of a possibility, and cannot be transferred.[116]

6. What may be transferred.—Property of any kind may be transferred, except as otherwise provided by this Act or by any other law for the time being in force,—

(a) The chance of an heir-apparent succeeding to an estate, the chance of a relation obtaining a legacy on the death of a kinsman, or any other mere possibility of a like nature, cannot be transferred;

(b) A mere right of re-entry for breach of a condition subsequent cannot be transferred to anyone except the owner of the property affected thereby;

(c) An easement cannot be transferred apart from the dominant heritage;

(1) Amendments

This section was amended by the amending Act, 1929.

(2) Property of Any Kind

These words indicate that transferability is the general rule, and that the right to property includes the right to transfer the property to another person.[124] The onus of proof is on the person alleging that any kind of property is not transferable.[125] To this rule, the clauses constitute exceptions. Some of the exceptions are similar to those made in section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 as to property which cannot be attached, eg a service tenure or a right to future maintenance or a public office or a pension; but decisions under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 are not always a safe guide,[126] and a private alienation may be made of property the attachment of which is prohibited, eg the tools of artisans.[127] The Rajasthan High Court has held that a gift, being a transfer without consideration, is not hit by section 6(h) which, inter alia, invalidates a transfer which hits section 23, Indian Contract Act, 1872. It has further held that where past cohabitation is only a motive and not a consideration for the transfer, the transfer is not void.[128] It has been held that a property such as coal ash, which is not in existence on the day of the contract, but would be available in due course of time, becomes potential property, and a sale in respect of such a property is established by a contract. The title in such property passes onto the purchaser, although it is held by the seller in the capacity of a trustee.[129]

Property of any kind does not include future property,[130] for a transfer of future property can only operate as a contract which may be specifically performed when the property comes into existence.[131] In a suit for partition, as between the passing of the preliminary and the final decree an assignment of the property is not valid as more property can be added and the principle that each shareholder has a right over every inch of the property applies.[132] Where through a settlement deed a large portion of property was settled absolutely in favour of the other while a portion of property by way of life interest was retained by him, an absolute settlement made with respect to the retained property later would be void.[133]

Statutory rights of claimants to compensation which crystallize on assessment and verification of claims are separate rights to property, and cannot vanish or evaporate on the death of the claimant.[134] In a dispute with regard to area, the boundary of the land or the plot number of the instrument/document would be determinative of the issue.[135]

(3) Exceptions Made by the Transfer of Property Act

These are set forth in the clauses to the section.

(4) Exceptions Made by any Other Law

The Supreme Court has held that an embargo upon the owner of the land to transfer the same should not be readily inferred. Right of transfer of land is indisputably incidental to the right of ownership. Such a right can be curtailed or taken away only by reason of a statute.[136] Restrictions are placed by Hindu law on the transfer of coparcenary property, and of property dedicated to religious uses. Mahomedan law imposes restrictions on the transfer of wakf property. Various local Acts as well as local customs restrict the transfer of agricultural tenancies. This is also the case with land held on service tenures, such as watan land in Bombay, karnam land in Madras, and ghatwal land in Bengal. Service tenures also fall under the exception in clause (d) of this section.

(5) Clause (a)—Spes Successionis

The possibilities referred to in this clause are bare possibilities, and not possibilities coupled with an interest such as contingent remainders and future interest.[137] The present interest of a widow in the property inherited by her from her husband can be transferred along with the incidental right of succeeding to the entire estate of the husband on the death of her co-widow.[138] With reference to a contingent interest, the Judicial Committee said:

> It is something quite different from a mere possibility of a like nature of an heir-apparent succeeding to the estate, or the chance of a relation obtaining a legacy, and also something quite different from a mere right to sue. It is a well ascertained form of property—it certainly has been transferred in this country for generations—in respect of which it is quite possible to raise money and to dispose off it in any way the beneficiary chooses.[139]

ILLUSTRATION

A Hindu, owning separate property dies leaving a widow B and a brother C. C has only a bare chance of succession in case he survives B, and this spes successionis he cannot transfer. But if A during his lifetime makes a settlement of his separate property to his wife for her life and then to his son if he should have one, and in default of a son to B, B has an interest contingent on A having no son, and that interest is transferable. When the rights of an adopted son are curtailed by an agreement giving the widow of the adoptive father the right to enjoy the property during her lifetime, the interest of the son is not a spes successionis, but is a vested interest, enjoyment and possession only being postponed.[140]

(6) Transfer by Heir-apparent

An heir-apparent is a person who would be the heir if he survived the propositus and if the propositus died intestate. Such a possibility is in English law not an interest or even a contingent title. The law was stated Re Parsons[141] as follows:

> It is indisputable law that no one can have any estate or interest at law or in equity, contingent or other, in the property of a living person to which he hopes to succeed as heir at law or next of kin of such living person. During the lifetime of such person no one can have more than a spes successionis, an expectation or hope of succeeding to his property.

The chance of a Mahomedan heir succeeding is a mere spes successionis, and cannot be the subject of a transfer or a release.[142]

ILLUSTRATION

A has a wife B and a daughter C. C in consideration of ₹1,000 paid to her by A, executes a release of her right to share in the inheritance to A's property. A dies and C claims her one-third share in the inheritance. B resists the claim and sets up the release signed by C. The release is no defence, for it is a transfer of a spes successionis, and C is entitled to her one-third share but is bound to bring into account the ₹1,000 received from her father.[143]

Where however, the transfer is not of the right of expectancy of an heir apparent but of the property itself, it cannot be said to be a transfer of a mere chance to succeed. Thus, when a person is not heard of for a long time and is believed to be dead, an agreement to transfer the property, entered into by his brother who is in enjoyment and possession of the property in dispute, is not a transfer of the right of expectancy, but of the property itself and is not hit by clause (a) of section 6.[144]

(7) Transfer by Hindu Reversioner

By the Hindu law the right of a reversionary heir expectant on the death of a Hindu widow is a spes successionis, and its transfer is a nullity and has no effect in law.[145]

In Amrit Narayan v Goya Singh[146] the Privy Council said:

> A Hindu reversioner has no right or interest in praesenti in the property which the female owner holds for her life. Until it vests in him on her death, should he survive her, he has nothing to assign or relinquish or even to transmit to his heirs. His right becomes concrete only on her demise; until then it is mere spes successionis.

For the same reason, a relinquishment by or on behalf of a reversionary heir of the reversionary right to succeed is invalid.[147] This rule of Hindu law was applied to Hindus independently of the present section by the Privy Council.[148] Since the Amending Act of 1929, the present section applies directly to Hindus.[149] If the reversioner purports to release his interests to the widow, her interest is in no way enlarged and the release cannot take effect as vesting in her the absolute estate in the property left by her husband.[150] Such a release might amount to an acknowledgment that the widow had an absolute right,[151] but the acknowledgement would not be binding on any one who may be the heir when the succession opens out.[152] But if the widow claims a property as her own, and the reversioner alleges it forms part of her husband's estate, and the dispute is bona fide settled between the parties, the settlement is binding on the whole body of reversioners, though the transaction might appear in one of its aspects as a dealing with a spes successionis.[153] The reversioner "can relinquish his right to say that the properties in dispute form part of the estate to which he is the reversioner".[154]

It was held by the Supreme Court in Jumma Masjid v Kadimaniandra Deviah,[155] that the principle of feeding the estoppel recognised in section 43 of the TP Act would apply to a case where a reversioner purports to transfer properties to which he has only a chance of succeeding if he has represented to the transferee that he was absolutely entitled to the properties, and if he subsequently acquires title to the properties. The court overruled a decision of the Madras High Court in Official Assignee of Madras v Sampath Naidu,[156] and held that though section 43 would not apply when the transferee knew the facts, there was no reason why a transferee who was not aware of the true facts and who acted on the fraudulent representation should not have the benefit of the equitable doctrine embodied in section 43.[157]

Agreement by Hindu reversioner to transfer

An agreement by reversionary heir to transfer or to relinquish his right of succession is also void.[158] In Annada v Gour Mohan,[159] the Privy Council said that it was impossible for them to admit the common sense of maintaining an enactment which would prevent the purpose of the contract, while permitting the contract to stand as a contract. The Bombay High Court has held that the equitable doctrine which regards that done which ought to be done, is excluded by the express prohibition in this section, and that an agreement by a person not to claim a share of an inheritance when it falls in, is void.[160] In some cases such agreements have (it is submitted erroneously) been held to be valid as agreements to take effect on a contingency.[161] The Allahabad High Court has in a series of cases[162] treated such agreement as valid, but the correctness of these decisions was doubted by CJ Piggott in Chahlu v Parmal,[163] and they must be taken as overruled by Annada v Gour Mohan.[164] The case of Chahlu v Parmal[165] was, however, a peculiar one and called for the application of another doctrine. In that case, there were four separated brothers. A, B, C and D. B died and A took his share and remarried his widow. Then D died and A agreed with C not to claim D's share after D's widow should die. But when D's widow died he did claim a share and the dispute was settled by a compromise that A should keep B's share and that C should keep D's share. This was a valid family settlement, and even if A's agreement not to claim D's share was invalid, yet A could not claim that share without bringing B's share into account.

Since an agreement to transfer a reversion is void, the court will not allow such an agreement to be embodied in a consent decree.[166] However, if a suit has been filed on an invalid agreement to assign the reversion, it may become the subject of a valid compromise after the reversion has fallen in.[167] Similarly, although an agreement to transfer a reversion is void, yet an alternative promise may constitute a valid substituted contract under section 58 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. In Mahadeo Prasad v Mathura,[168] there was an agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee by which the mortgagee agreed not to recover the balance due on his mortgage during the lifetime of a Hindu widow, and at her death to accept in discharge either a share of the mortgagor's reversion in three villages owned by the widow, or a share in another village owned by the mortgagor. This was held to be invalid as to the three villages, but valid as to the other village.

Estoppel of reversioner

Although both the transfer and the agreement to transfer a reversionary interest are void, yet a reversioner may be estopped from claiming the reversion by his conduct if he has consented to an alienation by a widow or other limited heir.[169]

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A Hindu widow executed a deed of gift of a part of her husband's property to D. F, who was then the nearest reversioner joined in the deed. On the widow's death F claimed the property pleading that the gift was invalid. F having consented to the gift is estopped from disputing its validity.[170]

(2) Tayava, a Hindu widow, disposed of the greater part of her husband's property by three deeds executed and registered on the same day. The first was a deed of gift to her brother, which was attested by the reversioner. The second was a deed of sale to one Annagowda, and the third was a deed of sale to her son- in-law. All the deeds formed part of the same transaction and were executed with Annagowda's consent. The Privy Council said:

> If some other person than Annagowda had been, at the death of Tayava, the nearest heir to her husband, it might have been open to him to question all or any of the three deeds but Annagowda himself being a party to and benefitting by the transaction evidenced thereby was precluded from questioning any part of it.[171]

This is particularly the case if the reversioner had been a party to a compromise,[172] or after they should be enfranchised in the name of the transferor as an agreement for the transfer of family settlement,[173] entered into by a widow or other limited heir which involves an alienation of the estate by her and if he has benefited by the transaction. Different considerations prevail, if the renunciation or relinquishment proceeds on a settlement of conflicting claims or bona fide disputes.[174]

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A Hindu died leaving as his heirs two daughters. Nevertheless, two separated cousins claimed the inheritance, and the dispute was settled by a compromise under which the property was partitioned and a fourth share was allotted to each cousin and daughter, as absolute owner. On the death of one daughter without issue, the sons of one of the cousins claimed to succeed to her quarter share as reversionary heir. The court held that as they had taken the place of their father and had, ever since his death, enjoyed possession of the share allotted to him, they were estopped from claiming as reversionary heirs.[175]

(2) A Hindu governed by the Benares school of law dies leaving a widow and three daughters two of whom have sons. The widow claimed to be absolutely entitled to certain properties which the daughters said belonged to their father. As there was a doubt about their rights, the members of the family agreed and arranged among themselves that the whole property should be divided among the daughters and their sons, the widow surrendering her share. Each daughter accepted the property allotted to her in severality in lieu of the undivided share in the whole estate which would have devolved upon her on the mother's death and abandoned the right of survivorship on the death of either of her sisters. 38 years later, after the death of the mother and two sisters, the third sister sued as heir of her father to recover a property sold to the defendant by one of the deceased sisters. The Privy Council said that in view of the favour shown by the court to family arrangements and the long period of time which had elapsed since the arrangement was made, the plaintiff could not be allowed to repudiate the arrangement and impeach a sale which had been made upon the faith of it.[176]

Compromises and family arrangements do not operate as transfers of reversionary interest, but as said by the Judicial Committee in Rani Mewa Kuwar v Rani Hulas Kunwar[177] and by the Supreme Court in Sadhu Madho Das v Pandit Mukand Ram,[178] are based on the assumption that there was an antecedent title of some kind in the parties, and the agreement acknowledges and defines what that title is. A compromise implies an existing dispute, but a family arrangement may be concluded for the avoidance of future disputes.[179] Where a son had entered into an arrangement with his father that he should be given a certain sum in consideration of his being considered to have separated, the agreement was held to be a family arrangement, and not contrary to section 6(a) of TP Act.[180] However, a member of the family who has not joined the family arrangement may challenge the same.[181]

(8) Mahomedan Law and Transfer of Spes Successionis

The present section does not apply in terms to Mahomedans.[182] The transfer of expectancy is invalid under that law.[183] It has been held that in the case of Mahomedans the transfer of expectancy by a heir presumptive is void ab initio and that no question of an estoppel can, therefore, arise by reason of the heir renouncing her claim before the expectancy opens.[184] This decision though justified on the facts of the case, errors, it is submitted, in stating the principle thus. The equitable estoppel arises in such cases not because the transfer is voidable, but because of the conduct of the transferor who purports to effect a transfer which is contrary to the provisions of law and, therefore, void.[185]

The object of the rule of Muslim law which does not recognise a purpoted transfer of a spes successionis as legally valid, is not to "prohibit" anything within the terms of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 (which invalidates agreements prohibited or opposed to public policy), but merely to make clear what is, and what is not, a transferable right or interest in property. Its purpose could not be to protect those who receive consideration for such a transfer.

Thus ordinarily there cannot be a transfer of spes successionis under Muslim law, but relinquishment of succession rights arising in future is permissible under a family arrangement and under the laws of testamentary succession or by accepting consideration for a future share. It can then operate as estoppel against the expectant heir to claim any share in the estate of the deceased on account of the doctrine of spes successionis. A family arrangement binding on the parties would operate as an estoppel by preventing the parties from resiling from the same or trying to revoke it after having taken advantage of such arrangement. The Supreme Court in Shehammal v Hassan Khan Rawther[186] held:

(i) That a deed of relinquishment executed by an heir apparent could operate as an estoppel to a claim that may be set up by the executor of such deed after inheritance opens on the death of the owner of the property;

(ii) Upon execution of a deed of relinquishment after having received remuneration for such future share, the expectant heir could be estopped from claiming a share in the inheritance;

(iii) By means of a family settlement, a Muslim can relinquish his right of spes successionis when he had still not acquired a right in the property.

The court drew support from the laws of testamentary succession governing Muslims whereby, despite the fact that a Muslim testator is prohibited from making a will of more than one third of his property, he can do so if the heirs give their consent to such bequest. Giving of such consent, the apex court said actually means renouncing their chances of obtaining a share on intestacy. This renunciation/relinquishment of future inheritance is on one hand forbidden under the TP Act and on the other hand accepted as valid under the rules of testamentary succession under Muslim law. Thus having accepted the consideration for having relinquished a future claim or share in the estate of the deceased, it would be against public policy if such a claimant be allowed the benefit of doctrine of spes successionis. In such cases the principle of estoppel would be attracted. In the instant case the question was relating to the validity of five relinquishment deeds executed by the siblings in favour of one brother who stayed with the father under which they relinquished their shares in the property of their father. The court held that the doctrine of estoppel would operate against them so as to prevent them from receiving an advantage for giving up their rights and yet claiming the same rights subsequently. Being opposed to public policy, the heir expectant would be estopped under the general law from claiming a share in the property of the deceased. Similarly, in Hameed v Jameela,[187] a daughter for a consideration relinquished her share of inheritance in the property of her father, but claimed inheritance upon his death. She and her husband had purchased property with the consideration for their relinquishment. The court applied the rules of estoppel and held that she having enjoyed the benefit by her relinquishment cannot claim that she was not bound by the relinquishment. The court clearly said that the receipt of money by an heir apparent in lieu of his/her share in the property of his/her father during his life time would estop the heir apparent from claiming the share of the property of the father upon his demise. Thus, where after relinquishment of her share in her father's property, a Muslim woman bought land with the money that she got in lieu of her relinquishment, and sold the same to X, representing to him that she was competent to do so but later refused to perform her part of the contract on the plea that she was not competent to relinquish her inheritance, the court held that she would be estopped from taking the benefit of section 6(a) and the transfer would be valid.[188]

The object

The protection of any party could be the object underlying such a rule—

> The protection of possible transferees, so that they may know what is, and what is not, a legally enforceable transfer.[189]

(9) Transfer of Spes Successionis in Punjab

The High Court of Lahore has held that the transfer of an expectancy is valid in Punjab where the TP Act does not apply,[190] and that a declaratory suit with reference to a spes successionis is maintainable.[191] The law applicable there, is in substance, the rule of English law.

(10) Chance of a Legacy

The chance of a relation or a friend receiving a legacy is a possibility even more remote than the chance of succession of an heir, and is not transferable.[192]

(11) Other Possibilities of a Like Nature

The usual illustration of a possibility is the case of a fisherman's net. There is no certainty that any fish will be caught, and the fisherman has no interest in the fish until they are caught. An agreement for the sale of otkarnam lands is a possibility and is, therefore, void.[193] There is a conflict of decisions as to whether a right to receive future offerings at a temple can be assigned. Some cases take the view that the chance that future worshippers will give offerings is a mere possibility which cannot be transferred,[194] while others hold that the right to receive offerings is not so uncertain, variable and limited as to pass out of the conception of the law.[195] With reference to the right to receive offerings at the sacred shrine of Shri Vaishno Devi Ji (Jammu and Kashmir), it has been held that the right is heritable.

The High Court observed:

> Although the right to receive the offerings from the pilgrims resorting to the shrine depends upon the chance that future pilgrims and worshippers will give offerings, the right to receive the offerings made is a valuable, definite and tangible right and is not merely a possibility of the nature referred to in section 6(a) of the Transfer of Property Act.[196]

Offerings that have actually been made may, of course, be transferred; and the Bombay High Court has held that the priest's share of the utpat or net balance of the offerings to an idol may be attached.[197] Future wages of a servant before they are earned are a mere expectancy which cannot be attached or sold.[198] Prior to the completion of a sale, a vendor's interest in the purchase money is only a possibility which cannot be transferred.[199] However, when land which had been acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, was restored by government to one of the owners on his undertaking to transfer their respective shares to the co-owners, the latter had a beneficial interest in the land, and not a mere possibility.[200] As to the words "of a like nature", it has been held that they indicate possibilities of the same kind as the chance of a legacy,[201] or a chance of being paid a gratuity.[202] However, a contract for the sale of a property which is not the vendor's at the time of the contract, but which the vendor thinks of acquiring by purchase later on, is not bad in law.[203] A customary right to scavenge is not a kind of property which can be transferred.[204]

(12) Clause (b)—Transfer of Right of Re-entry

A "mere right of re-entry" refers to the right of re-entry which a transferor reserves to himself, after having parted with the whole estate, for breach of a condition subsequent. This is the right referred to in section 111 (g) which the lessor has against the lessee for breach of an express condition, which provides that on its breach the lessor may re-enter. Such a condition is a condition subsequent defined in section 31 which divests an estate which has already vested. A right of re-entry implies an estate of reversion, and cannot be transferred apart from the estate to which it belongs. The transfer of the reversion, i.e., of the lessor's interest, carries with it the right of re-entry. The transfer of a lessor's interest including a right of re-entry is not a transfer of a mere right of re-entry, and is valid.

The expression "mere right of re-entry", therefore, means a right of re-entry apart from any interest in the property. If not accompanied by an interest in property, it is a personal license and not transferable. This is illustrated by the case of Re Davis & Co, ex-parte Rawlings.[205] In that case, goods were delivered under a hire purchase agreement which gave the bailor a right to enter the premises where the goods were kept, and take possession in default of payment of any installment. The bailor assigned his rights under the agreement by way of security to his creditor; it was held that the creditor could not enforce the right of re-entry as it was only a personal license which was not assignable.

(13) Clause (c)—Transfer of Easement

An easement is defined in section 4 of the Easements Act 5 of 1882 as "a right which the owner or occupier of certain land possesses, as such, for the beneficial enjoyment of that land, to do and continue to do something or to prevent and continue to prevent something being done, in or upon, or in respect of, certain other land not his own". An easement includes a profit a prendre, i.e., a right to enjoy a profit out of the land of another.[206] An easement cannot be detached from the dominant heritage, but passes with it as a legal incident to the property transferred. This is enacted in section 8 of TP Act, and in section 19 of the Indian Easements Act, 1882. The present section in effect enacts that there cannot be an easement in gross.[207] A thing in gross exists in its own right, and not as an appendage to another thing. An easement cannot be in gross, for it must be a right over one piece of land for the benefit of another piece of land and, therefore, cannot be transferred without the land that has the benefit of it. Right of way which may be enjoyed irrespective of a dominant heritage as sometimes called easement in gross, but this is an incorrect use of the term.[208]

In India there are various rights which resemble easements, but are really not easements. They are customary rights saved by section 2(b) of the Indian Easements Act, 1882,[209] such as a kamaki right to collect leaves for manure and to pasture cattle;[210] a right to use the land of another person for a holi festival;[211] or for a bathing ghat,[212] or for a burial ground,[213] or for the celebration of the mohurrum,[214] or of the ram lila.[215] Such rights are independent of any dominant heritage.[216]

The section refers to the transfer of an existing easement, and not to the grant of an easement. The grant of an easement is not a transfer of property;[217] and the provisions of the TP Act have no application to the creation of easements.[218] An easement may be released in favour of the owner of the servient tenement, but such a release effects not a transfer, but an extinction of the easement.[219] The imposition, acquisition and transfer of easements, is governed by the provisions of chapter II of the Indian Easements Act, 1882 (sections 8–18).

(14) Clause (d)—Restricted Interests

An interest restricted in enjoyment to the owner personally is by its very nature not transferable, unless the restriction is void under section 10. A transfer of such property would defeat the object of the restriction. For instance, the object of a right of pre-emption is to prevent the introduction to strangers as co-sharers, and the sale of such a right to an outsider would defeat that object. A grant for parwarish is restricted in enjoyment to the grantee, and cannot be alienated.[220] In the case of a religious office J Macpherson said:

> Such a sale would practically destroy the endowment, or have the effect of defeating the whole object of its creation. There would be no guarantee that the service would be properly kept up; for the purchaser whoever he might be—even if a Mahomedan or a Christian—would have the right of performing the worship of this Hindu idol.[221]

Again, with reference to the sale by urallers or trustees of a Hindu temple, the Privy Council said that where the founder of a religious endowment may be supposed to have established a corporation with the distinct object of securing the due performance of the worship, and the due administration of the property, by the instrumentality and at the discretion of its members, they have no power to transfer their right.[222] For this reason, a religious office is not a transferable property.[223] The office of shebait of a temple,[224] or mahani of a math,[225] or mutwalli of a wakf,[226] cannot be transferred. A vritti is not saleable property;[227] nor the right of village joshi to perform religious ceremonies at the house of his yajman;[228] nor the birt maha brahmani or right to officiate at funeral ceremonies;[229] nor birt khakrobi rights.[230] The life interest holders having a mere right of residence cannot transfer such restricted interest.[231]

A paid or turn of worship, and the pujari's right to receive offerings, or as a co-sharer,[232] are res extra commercium, and cannot be alienated,[233] though by custom they may be transferable to another Brahmin.[234] A person gets no right to perform pooja on the basis of a sale deed but he would have a right to share the offerings nevertheless.[235] The sale of vajman vahis or pilgrim visitor's books is not invalid, but the sale carries with it no right to act as guide to the pilgrims.[236] It has been held by the Patna High Court in Zobair Ahmad v Jainandan,[237] following a decision of the Privy Council,[238] and earlier decisions of the same High Court,[239] that the right of a Mahomedan widow to retain possession of her husband's property in lieu of her dower debt is personal to her, and is a restricted interest within the meaning of section 6(d). The court refused to follow certain other decisions[240] to the contrary on the ground that those decisions were no longer good law in view of the decisions of the Privy Council. However, where the transferor was the absolute owner of the property gifted and it was not restricted in its enjoyment to herself, the Supreme Court held that section 6(d) was not attracted.[241]

It is not correct to say that whatever right the deceased may have had to obtain a lease survived and vested in the heirs after his death. It may be that the heirs and legal representatives, if they are continuing the business or industry of the deceased and have the required qualifications, obtain priority over an earlier applicant on account of special reasons for this preference. But, in each case, they have to apply afresh and set out their own qualifications.[242]

(15) Custom

It has been held in several cases that the inalienable character of a religious office may be affected by custom, and alienation to members of the founder's family or of the priestly family has sometimes been permitted.[243] Chief Justice Rankin in Panchanan v Surendra Nath[244] said that some of the cases on this point[245] ought not to be followed; and pointed out that the Privy Council in Rajah Vurmah v Ravi Vwmah[246] said that a custom sanctioning the sale of a trusteeship for the pecuniary advantage of the trustees would be bad in law.

The cases cited in this paragraph refer to Hindu religious offices, and were decided before the amending Act of 1929. Now that this chapter of the TP Act supersedes the Hindu law, it is open to question whether a customary right of transfer can be recognised, if it conflicts with section 6(d). Possibly where the interest in the enjoyment of the office is by custom restricted not to the incumbent personally, but to the members of his family, a transfer to a member of the family may not be in contravention of this sub-section.

(16) Service Tenures

In service tenures the interest in the land is the remuneration for the personal service to be rendered. It is, therefore, a necessary incident of such tenures that they should be incapable of alienation. Thus, ghatwal tenures in Bengal, created to provide a local military and police force, are inalienable,[247] and cannot be sold in execution of a decree against the ghatwal,[248] but if the performance of military service is abolished, as in the case of palyan land in Madras, the alienations would be valid.[249] A chowkidar in Bengal who holds chakran lands cannot alienate them beyond the term of his office.[250] A watandar in Bombay cannot alienate watan land beyond his lifetime to a person who is not a member of the watan family.[251] The prohibition against alienation in the Watan Act is not absolute, for section 5 allows alienation with the sanction of the Collector, and a watandar may be estopped from impreaching his alienation.[252] Karnam lands in Madras cannot be alienated by the holder of the office to the prejudice of his successor.[253] Inam lands or the performance of swastivachakam service in a temple cannot be alienated.[254] However, a right to money charged upon land with the object that religious ceremonies should be performed may be transferred, for if the performance of ceremonies is not a condition precedent to payment, it does not constitute a religious office.[255] Muafi lands, i.e., granted with a remission of revenue to certain Brahmins and their descendants on condition that they should give their blessings to the Maharaja of Nepal are transferable.[256]

Land held on service tenure may lose its character of inalienability. In Radha Bai v Anantrav,[257] J West said:

> When an estate is freed from its connection with a public office, the reason arising from that connection for the preservation of the estate intact and unencumbered, necessarily fails.

Similarly, in Bhagwal Baksh Ray v Sheo Prosad Sahu,[258] it was said that:

> On principle, it may well be maintained that when service can no longer be enforced and the tenure consequently ceases to be a service tenure, the land can be alienated.

Accordingly, a ghatwal tenure loses its character of inalienability when the services have been commuted by a money payment,[259] or the tenure on military service has been abolished.[260]

Resumption of service tenure

A service tenure may be (1) a grant of an office for which the land is the remuneration; or (2) a grant of land burdened with a condition of service.

In case (1) the land is prima facie resumable, but in case (2) the land is not resumable, unless a condition of resumption is expressed in the terms of the grant or implied from the circumstances under which it was made. The onus is on the grantor to prove such a condition.[261] However, once the tenure has been established, it is not terminated by obsolescence and desuetude, but it is "necessary to find something done or omitted to be done on the part of the government, as the grantors, which would have the legal effect of a surrender and regrant of the lands on new terms, or, at any rate, of a release of the right to appoint the ghatwal and call for the performance of the services"[262]

(17) Right of Pre-emption Not Transferable

The right of pre-emption, has been defined as a right in the event of a sale to purchase the property upon agreed terms.[263] It can only be exercised as to immovable property. It is a purely personal right, which cannot be transferred to a stranger. The object of the right is to prevent the introduction of strangers as co-sharers, and the right is enforced on the assumption that the introduction of strangers causes inconvenience to the pre-emptive co-sharers. It is a transient right in its very inception and nature, and being a personal privilege cannot be transferred to anyone except the owner of the property affected thereby.[264] Where a pre-emptor in anticipation of his success in a pre-emption suit transfers the "pre-emptional" property, he is not entitled to enforce his right of pre-emption.[265] However, a plaintiff who has obtained a decree for pre-emption may mortgage his rights under the decree in order to put himself in funds to pay the purchase money for the pre-empted property.[266] The right of pre-emption under Muslim law is an enforceable right.[267] This law is applied as between Mahomedans as a matter of "justice, equity and good conscience" by all the courts in India, except the erstwhile Madras Presidency where the courts declined to apply it on the ground that it places a restriction on the liberty of transfer.[268] Right of pre-emption has received statutory recognition in Punjab by the Punjab Laws Act, 1872, and in Oudh by the Oudh Laws Act, 1876. The right also exists by custom among Hindus in Bihar,[269] and certain parts of Gujarat.

The right of pre-emption is sometimes given by contract or covenant. Where a purchaser gave a right of pre-emption to one of his vendors if he could raise the price before a certain day without the help of others, the right was held to be incapable of assignment.[270] Where a statute providing for a right of pre-emption lays down that it accrues only when transfer of the property takes place and such transfer is not complete except through a registered deed, a suit filed before the sale deed is executed is premature as the right of pre-emption under the statute did not accrue till the transfer became effective through a registered deed.[271]

(18) Contract

The benefit of a contract can be assigned as an actionable claim. This is, however, subject to two exceptions in the case of an executory contract, (1) when the contract is one which had been induced by personal qualifications or considerations as to the parties to it; and (2) when the benefit is coupled with an obligation which the assignor is bound to discharge.[272]

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) Where R agreed with M to grow indigo for him taking the seeds from M's factory and cultivating it according to M's instructions, it was held that the contract was entered into with reference to the personal position and qualifications of M, and that he could not assign it.[273] In such a case, the enjoyment of the benefit of the contract is restricted to the party personally and cannot be transferred.

(2) In a similar case,[274] A agreed to manufacture salt for B, and the terms of the contract allowed B credit for payment, and a discretion as to the quantity of salt to be demanded, and it was held that B could not assign the contract.

(19) Clause (dd)—Transfer of Right to Maintenance

This clause was added by the amending Act of 1929. Prior to the amendment there was a conflict of opinion on whether a right of future maintenance when it was fixed by a decree was transferable? The Madras High Court held that it was,[275] but the Calcutta High Court ruled that it was not.[276] The amendment supersedes the decisions of Madras High Court. Section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 also exempts a right of future maintenance from attachment.[277]

The effect of this clause is that the assignment of a decree for maintenance would be valid as to maintenance already accrued due, but not as to future maintenance.

The words 'in whatsoever manner arising, secured or determined' are very comprehensive; and it is submitted that they overrule cases in which when the right has been created by a deed of transfer, it was held that the question whether the right was alienable depends upon the intention of the parties as expressed in the deed.[278]

The right of a Hindu widow to maintenance is a personal right and from its nature incapable of assignment;[279] but arrears of maintenance can be attached and sold like any other debt.[280] The interest of a Hindu widow in land which has been allotted to her for her maintenance is not property which can be attached.[281] However, if land is assigned to a Hindu widow in lieu of maintenance, the transfer of such land is not a transfer of a right of maintenance, and is valid during the widow's lifetime.[282] When villages were allotted to a person, under a compromise, for his maintenance and without power of transfer during his brother's lifetime, the Privy Council held that his interest was a right of future maintenance and could not be attached,[283] but a receiver was allowed to be appointed to realise the rents and pay what was sufficient for the maintenance of the judgment-debtor, and the balance to his creditors. Where, however, a Mahomedan widow retains possession of property in lieu of her dower debt, she cannot transfer the property even during her lifetime. A hereditary grant of an allowance of paddy out of the melwaram of land is not a right to future maintenance.[284] Grants out of the revenue of an impartible estate for the maintenance of cadets of the family are alienable with a reversion to the grantor on the death of the last male heir.[285]

A vested life interest under a will in a definite fund or income of a property is transferable.[286] An annuity granted by will is not a right to future maintenance, and may be attached or sold.[287] There is, however, a difference between a maintenance allowance and an annuity.[288] An annuity granted by way of maintenance by deed which creates a charge on land, has been held to be alienable;[289] but in view of the words 'in whatsoever manner arising, secured or determined' it is doubtful if this decision is still good law. Thus, in Bibi Haliman v Bibi Umadalunmssa,[290] the Patna High Court came to the conclusion that a right of this nature though made a charge on immovable property, could not be transferred. When a settlor creates a trust of his property, and reserves an allowance for himself, the allowance is not maintenance within this clause.[291]

(20) Clause (e)—Transfer of a Mere Right to Sue

Prior to the amending Act 2 of 1900 this clause was—"a mere right to sue/or compensation for a fraud or for harm illegally caused cannot be transferred". The amending Act of 1900 widened the clause by omitting the words other than "a mere right to sue", and at the same time restricted the definition of actionable claim (which formerly embraced all claims which a civil court recognised as affording grounds for relief) to debts and beneficial interests in movable property not in possession. The effect of this amendment was to make clear the distinction between property and a right to sue. As before the amendment, a right to sue for damages for breach of contract would have been an actionable claim although such right was not property and not attachable as such. Again the former definition was inadequate, for it was limited to rights of suit for damages for tort. Such rights are undoubtedly not assignable; but there are other rights to sue arising out of contract which also cannot be assigned.[292]

In England, what were called bare or naked rights of litigation were regarded not assignable at common law as they savoured of champerty and maintenance. At equity, however, each such transaction was considered on its merits, and if it was found to be tainted with champerty or maintenance it would be struck down.[293] However, equity would not "emulate the hysteria of the common law in smelling out maintenance where no maintenance was".[294] It was held that the basis of section 6(e) is this rule of English Law.[295] The Supreme Court, in UOI v Sri Sara Mills Ltd,[296] has held that:

> Section 6(e) of the Transfer of Property Act states that a mere right to sue cannot be transferred. A bare right of action might be claims to damages for breach of contract or claims to damages for tort. An assignment of a mere right to litigation is bad. An assignment of property is valid even although that property may be incapable of being received without litigation. The reason behind the rule is that a bare right of action for damages is not assignable because, the law will not recognise any transaction which may savour of maintenance of champerty. It is only when there is an interest in the subject-matter that a transaction can be saved from the imputation of maintenance. That interest must exist apart from the assignment and to that extent must be independent of it.

A Full Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court[297] has, in similar words, indicated the true scope of the clause:

> The basis of the exception being that (a) transaction savouring of maintenance or champerty should not be recognised, it follows that a transaction not open to the charge would be upheld. Therefore, soon an exception to the rule of a bare right of action being assignable came to be recognised. This exception provides that a right of action may be assigned if it be incidental or subsidiary to a conveyance of property. From the aforesaid historical background it is clear how section 6(e) of the Transfer of Property Act which provides that a mere right to sue cannot be transferred is associated with the exception of the bare right of action not being assignable. It is equally clear that the provision being aimed against transactions which according to English law would amount to champerty and maintenance, whenever a transaction would be free of such charge, it would be valid.

It should also be remembered that the specific rules of English law against champerty and maintenance have not been adopted in India, and English decisions on what is a naked right of action are not always a safe guide in determining cases arising under this clause.[298]

A right to sue is personal to the party aggrieved, and there can be no assignment of a right to sue for damages for tort or for breach of contract.[299] Where an advocate assigned his right to petitioner to sue the defendant and claim compensation for defamation, it was held that right to sue for damages concerning defamation cannot be transferred by one person in favour of another and a pauper application filed at the instance of this other person would not be maintainable.[300]

Where there is no right vested in the plaintiff of user, permissive or otherwise, merely confirming the right to institute an action cannot be recognized by Court as it "savours of maintenance of champerty" and section 6(e) of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 bars transfer of a mere right to sue.[301] Similarly, a mere right to sue is not an interest which vests in the receiver in insolvency,[302] or which can be attached. However, where a property is transferred along with a right to recover damages or compensation in respect of that property, the assignment of the right is valid, and is not hit by this clause.[303] Similarly, when a company which is a plaintiff in a pending suit is amalgamated with another company, the right of the amalgamated company to be substituted as plaintiff is not hit by this clause.[304] The insurer having paid the loss to the insured is entitled to be subrogated. This would mean that the insurer should get any amount that the insured is entitled from the carrier by way of damages for its negligence.[305]

A claim for compensation for use and occupation against a tenant holding over has been held to be one sounding in damages and, therefore, not transferable.[306] The Supreme Court has held that where the testator executed a will which sought to convey to the legatee "the right to plead the said case" and "the right to all debts and credits as may be decided by the courts", the testator not only sought to transfer the mere right to represent her case in the pending litigation to the legatee, but had also given the legatee her interest in the subject-matter of the litigation and hence, permissible in law.[307]

Where a minor transfers the property unauthorisedly sold by his guardian, the minor does not transfer a mere right to sue.[308] Considering the question whether a transferee from a minor after he attained majority, can file a suit to set aside the alienation made by the minor's guardian, the Supreme Court held that the right transferred by the minor after he attained majority was an interest in property which was capable of enforcement at the instance of the purchaser in the same way in which it was at the instance of the ex-minor prior to transfer in view of section 8(3) of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act, 1956. Such a provision, intended specially for the protection of the interests of the minor, must be read in harmony and consistency with the general provisions contained in section 6 of the TP Act.[309] In the instant case, on the facts, the transfer of the property made by the guardian was a voidable transaction and it was, therefore, open to the minor to challenge it and seek recovery of possession. Such a right of minor is a right or interest in property which he himself or "any person claiming under him" as defined in section 8(3) of the Guardianship Act may enforce by instituting a suit. "Any person claiming under him" must necessarily include a purchaser.[310] On the other hand, if a manager of a joint hindu family sells joint family property without necessity, it has been held that a coparcener has still an interest in the property which he can sell without suing to set aside the manager's sale, and that the coparcener's sale is a transfer of property with an incidental right of suit.[311]

A person may have a right to sue by virtue of ownership of property transferred to him. A right to obtain the reconveyance of property is a right to property and may be transferred.[312]

(21) Transfer of Mesne Profits, Rents etc

A right to mesne profits is a mere right to sue which cannot be transferred and so a bare right to sue for mesne profits cannot be assigned, as mesne profits are unliquidated damages, and not a debt.[313] A transfer of a mining lease along with an assignment of a contract of indemnity pertaining to the premises demised, is not hit by this clause.[314] So also an attachment of profits which had not become due was held to be an attachment of a mere right to sue which could not be the subject-matter of sale,[315] but if a sale of land is accompanied with an assignment of mesne profits already accrued due, the assignment is valid,[316] but not otherwise.[317] This distinction was not noticed in a case decided by Madras High Court,[318] but it was pointed out in clear terms in a later case.[319] So also a transfer of land with rents already accrued due is valid.[320] The Patna High Court has held that a transferee of land and of mesne profits already accrued due, cannot maintain a suit for the mesne profits as such profits are damages, and not a debt.[321] It is submitted that this is erroneous and ignores effect of the word "mere" which limits the prohibition to transferees which purport to transfer nothing, but the right to sue.[322] The chief court of Oudh has held that the transferee of a debt may sue to recover the debt, but not for interest before the assignment claimed by way of damages under section 73 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.[323]

(22) Mere Right to Sue Distinguished from Actionable Claim

An actionable claim is property, and the assignee has a right to sue to enforce the claim.[324] B cannot sue for a debt due to A, nor can A assign to B the right to sue for the debt due to A. But if A assigns the debt to B, then B may sue to recover it as a debt due to himself. A right of contribution is not a mere right to sue, but is an actionable claim which may be assigned.[325] The assignment of differences on cross contracts has been held to be valid as an assignment of a debt or an actionable claim, and not of a mere right to sue.[326] In an actionable claim, a letter of subrogation, not being an assignment of a mere right to sue is valid and enforceable.[327]

However, a debt or actionable claim must be distinguished from a right to sue for damages. After a breach of contract for the sale of goods, nothing is left but a right to sue for damages which cannot be transferred.[328] But before breach, the benefit of an executory contract for the sale of goods may generally be transferred, and the buyer has the right to sue for the goods.[329]

The right to the profits of a village actually accrued due at the date of the transfer, is a debt which may be assigned.[330] If a certain sum of money is due from a person, that sum of money is recoverable on assignment even though a calculation may be necessary to determine the exact amount,[331] and the right to recover a definite amount in the hands of an agent may be assigned.[332] So also a right to a sum of money found due on taking an account is assignable.[333] As to whether the right to recover such money as may be found due on taking an account from an agent can be assigned, the cases are conflicting. In some cases it has been held that such an assignment is not of a mere right to sue, but of money belonging to the principal which is in the agent's hands, and that it is a debt although the amount remains to be ascertained.[334] In others, it has been held that the assignment is a mere right to sue the agent for failure to pay.[335] The distinction between a transfer of a mere right to sue and a transfer of an actionable claim is well illustrated by the Privy Council case quoted in illustration (1) below.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A's lessee had covenanted to pay the government assessment or in default to be liable to A in damages. A sold the reversion to B and also assigned to B his right to recover from the lessee certain installments of assessment which he had paid owing to the lessee's default. The High Court held the assignment to be void as an assignment of a mere right to sue. But the Privy Council held that the lessee's failure to pay did not give rise to a claim for damages within the meaning of the clause in the lease, but a claim for reimbursement of the precise sum A had paid to meet the obligation. It was therefore valid as an assignment of an actionable claim.[336]

(2) A agrees to sell to D a certain quantity of gunny bags deliverable on a future day. There are no circumstances of a personal character in the contract. Before the due date B assigns his beneficial interest in the contract to C. Thereafter, A commits a breach of the contract. This is not an assignment of a mere right to sue but of an actionable claim and is valid. C is entitled to sue for damages for not delivering the gunny bags.[337]

Other instances of transfers valid as transfers of an actionable claim are the transfer of the benefit of a contract to reconvey land;[338] the transfer by a dispossessed mortgagee of his right to recover his mortgage money;[339] a partner's unascertained interest in a dissolved partnership;[340] a transfer of a right to recover back the price paid on failure of the vendor to deliver possession;[341] an assignment to the insurer who has paid a claim for short delivery of goods during carriage of all rights of the consignor against the carrier.[342] In a case of High Court of Bombay,[343] a partner A released his share in the partnership to his partners and then assigned his share to B. A alleged that the release to his partners had been obtained by fraud. The court held that what was assigned to B was A's right to sue to set aside the release on the ground of fraud, and that such a right could not be assigned. A right to the income of property payable to a beneficiary under a settlement may be assigned. It is not a mere right of suit even though further inquiry is necessary to determine the amount.[344]

(23) Transfer of Decree

A decree is neither an actionable claim, nor a mere right of suit. When a claim has merged in a judgment and has been decreed, it is no longer a right to sue, and is assignable as a decree although the original cause of action was not assignable. Thus, a decree for mesne profits may be validly assigned.[345] Similarly, an order passed by Railways Claims Tribunal has all the incidents of a civil court and is enforceable.[346] Even an eviction decree/order may be an asset and the continuation of existence may lie with the transferee landlord company.[347]

(24) Transfer of a Mere Right to Sue and Public Policy

The assignment of a right to sue is as much opposed to public policy as is gambling in litigation. Gambling in litigation is forbidden as opposed to public policy, and when such agreements are extortionate or oppressive,[348] they are not enforced, though compensation for legitimate expenses may properly be awarded.[349] In the undernoted case,[350] the Privy Council condemned the practice of the official assignee selling land which was in possession of a person who claimed to have purchased from the insolvent, as being in substance if not in form nothing more than the sale of a right to litigate. On the other hand, if the transaction is made bona fide with the object of assisting a claim believed to be just, a present transfer by a person who is not in possession, and who has not yet established title thereto is not invalid.[351] Both in England,[352] and in India,[353] a bona fide transfer of the fruits of an action is not illegal, for such an assignment is an assignment of future property.

(25) Insurance

It is provided in the Marine Insurance Act, 1963 that this clause is not to affect sections 17, 52, 53 and 79 of that Act. Those sections provide for assignment of marine insurance policies, rights of subrogation, etc.

(26) Clause (f)—Transfer of Public Office

A public office is analogous to the case in clause (d), for a public office is held for qualities personal to the incumbent. A public servant is defined in the Indian Penal Code 1860 and a public officer in the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, but there is no definition in TP Act. In Henley v Lyme Corporation,[354] it was said that "every one who is appointed to discharge a public duty, and receives a compensation in whatever shape, whether from the Crown or otherwise, is constituted a public officer". A lien connotes a civil right of the government servant to hold post to which he is appointed substantively i.e., in accordance with law and cannot be transferred.[355]

It is opposed to public policy that a public officer should transfer the salary of his office, for the salary is given for the purpose of upholding its dignity and the proper performance of its duties.[356] In Grenfell v The Dean and Conors of Windsor,[357] MR Lord Langdale said:

> There are various cases in which public duties are concerned, in which it may be against public policy that the income arising for the performance of those duties should be assigned; and for this simple reason, because the public is interested, not only in the performance from time to time of the duties, but also in the fit state of preparation of the party having to perform them.

The percentage a khot receives for collecting assessment is not salary.[358]

Cases in India have arisen generally with reference to religious and village offices.[359] An assignment of a gratuity payable to the legal representative of a public officer is not prohibited.[360] If there is a doubt as to who is the proper incumbent, a compromise of the dispute is not contrary to public policy.[361] A railway servant cannot agree to the attachment of a part of his salary.[362] It has, however, been held that a transfer of the turn of worship and the right to recover offerings is valid, though such office may be held to be a public office.[363] It has been held by the Madras High Court,[364] that an agreement by which a person agreed to pay a certain proportion of his income to his brother in consideration for his having been maintained and educated by the latter was not hit by this clause merely because that person subsequently became a government servant; the amount agreed to be paid could be paid from his savings or any other source, and the court held that it did not amount to the transfer of a public office.

(27) Clause (g)—Transfer of Pensions

A pension is a periodical payment of money by the government.[365] It is non-transferable,[366] and civil and military pensions are also exempt from attachment under section 60(g) of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. There are similar provisions in The Pensions Act, 1871. In Secretary of State v Khemchand Jeychand,[367] J Melville said that the ordinary and well-known meaning of a pension was "a periodical allowance or stipend granted, not in respect of any right, privilege, perquisite, or office, but on account of past services or particular merits or as compensation to dethroned princes, their families, and dependants". An allowance granted for other considerations is not within the prohibition and can be assigned.[368] A bonus or a reward[369] or a grant of land or of land revenue even though in lieu of pension[370] or a Jagir[371] or an allowance made in lieu of a presumed grant of lands is not a pension.[372] and is, therefore, transferable though the Lahore High Court held that a pension may take the form of an assignment of land revenue.[373]

A pension which the Government of India has by treaty with another sovereign power guaranteed to pay, a political pension in its strictest sense;[374] and so is an allowance paid to a political prisoner, although the allowance is collected by the Government of India from a foreign state.[375] Other instances of political pensions are allowances granted to the "Candyan pensioners" of Ceylon;[376] to the members of the Mysore family;[377] and to descendants of the Nawab of the Carnatic,[378] but a toda giras hak which is an allowance paid to girassias for police services is not a political pension.[379]

A pension retains its character as long as it is unpaid and in the hands of government, but as soon as it is paid to the pensioner or his legal representative or agent it can be attached or transferred.[380]

The prohibition does not apply to private pensions, and pensions granted to railway servants can be attached and sold.[381]

This clause does not apply to pensions payable by a foreign state when remitted to a pensioner in India.[382] What is provided by clause (g) of section 6 is that stipends allowed to military, naval, air-force and civil pensioners of government and political pensioners, cannot be transferred. What is made non-transferable is, therefore, stipend paid to civil pensioners, and not to pension of civil pensioners.[383]

(28) Clause (h)

Previous clauses have defined the kinds of property that cannot be transferred, but the scope of this clause is difficult to define. Sub-clause (1) seems to state the self-evident proposition that what cannot be transferred is not transferable. Sub-clause (3) states the equally self-evident proposition that there cannot be a transfer without a transferee. Sub-clause (2) states that:

No transfer can be made for an unlawful object or consideration within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act.

These words mean that the law does not recognise such a transfer. In other words, when such a transfer is made, the courts will give no assistance either to the transferor to revoke it, or to the transferee to enforce it. It has been held that section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 does not prohibit enforcement of a valid portion of the transfer of property or debt, if it is severable from the invalid portion. Thus, where a part of the mortgage debt was invalid because it was hit by sub-section (2) of section 54-A of the Companies Act, 1913 read with section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, it was held that the invalid portion of the consideration of the mortgage was severable, and the plaintiff-corporation was not entitled to recover the same.[384] If the contract of tenancy is hit by section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, the "lease" resulting from such a contract will be void in view of section 6(h) of the TP Act.[385] Similarly, a promoter can charge cost of open parking space and stilt parking space in proportion to carpet area from each flat purchaser but cannot sell the same at all.[386]

(29) Sub-clause (1) of clause (h)—Opposed to the Nature of the Interest

Res communes which belongs to nobody, such as light, air and water of rivers of the sea would be things which, from their very nature, cannot be transferred. Things dedicated to public or religious uses are classed as res extra commercium which cannot be bought or sold.[387] Regalia, heirlooms, and debutter property[388] are, therefore, inalienable. A transfer of a service inam has been held to be void as opposed to the nature of the interest affected, and also as opposed to public policy.[389] Similarly, shebaitship is not property which is capable of being disposed off.[390] The test is whether the service-holder has placed himself beyond the reach of his income, whether by a sale or a mortgage or by a lease under which he receives no periodical payments. So a lease of such property yielding an annual rent would be valid, though such a lease for a premium may be void.[391] An alienation of standing crops on such land is, therefore, valid.[392] Most of the cases referred to under cll (d) and (dd) would fall under this sub-clause.

(30) Sub-clause (2) of clause (h)—Consideration

These are the words used in section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. They are disjunctive, as "object" means purpose or design. An assignment for a money consideration to defeat the provisions of the Insolvency Act is for a valid consideration, but it is for an unlawful object.[393] On the other hand, a transfer of property to a sex worker for future cohabitation is a transfer for a consideration which is unlawful as it is immoral.[394] A distinction must, however, be made between the consideration for a transfer, and its motive; in Nagaratnamba v Ramayya,[395] the Supreme Court held that a transfer motivated by the fact that the transferor and transferee had cohabited was without consideration, and was, therefore, a gift. Such a transfer is not hit by section 6(h). The Supreme Court approved Belo v Parbati[396] in which a mortgage said to be in consideration of past cohabitation was held not to be hit by section 6(h), but observed that strictly speaking, past cohabitation was only the motive. However, it would be otherwise when the transfer was in the form of a gift and illicit cohabitation was the motive, and not an object or consideration.[397]

Where object or consideration partly lawful and partly unlawful

The TP Act contains no provision corresponding to section 24 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, with reference to a transfer which is partly lawful and partly unlawful. A transfer of occupancy land is (except in certain circumstances) void under the Agra Tenancy Act 2 of 1901, but a transfer of lands comprising both zamindari land and inalienable occupancy land has been held to be valid as to the zamindari land.[398] The cases decided by Allahabad High Court are not consistent, and are cited in the judgment of J Mukerji in Dip Narain Singh v Nageshar.[399]

Where possession delivered under an unlawful transfer

Transfers for an unlawful object or consideration are void, but if possession has been given in pursuance of a transfer that is void for this reason, the general rule is in pari delicio polior est condition possidentis, and the transferor cannot recover the property he has professed to transfer.[400] In such a case, the court would not act, but would say "let the estate lie where it falls".[401] Where, however, the transferee sues to obtain possession, the court will allow the defendant, i.e., the transferor, to set up the plea of fraud; in such case, considerations of public policy demand that the issue be agitated. If the court finds fraud established, the court will let the property stay where it lies. Adopting any other course would have the effect of acting upon an instrument which is void ab initio.[402] Section 6(h) does not annul this rule of law, but only lays down that the court will not enforce a transfer which will have the effect of carrying out an unlawful object.[403] To this general rule that the court will not interfere, there are three exceptions which are enumerated in section 84 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 which is as follows:

> Where the owner of property transfers it to another for an illegal purpose and such purpose is not carried into execution, or the transferor is not as guilty as the transferee, or the effect of permitting the transferee to retain the property might be to defeat the provisions of any law, the transferee must hold the property for the benefit of the transferor.

In the first case mentioned in section 84 of Indian Trusts Act, 1882, there is a locus paenitentiae until the fraud is carried out, and the transferor may sue to recover his property.[404] The second case is where the transferor is not as guilty as the transferee. In the analogous case of contract, section 27(l)(h) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963 allows a contract to be rescinded if the defendant is more to blame than the plaintiff. The third case is where permitting the transferee to retain the property would defeat the provisions of any law, eg a transfer which would have the effect of withdrawing the property from the transferor's creditors, and so defeating the law of insolvency.[405] An exhaustive examination of the case law on this point by J Tekchand will be found in a case decided by Lahore High Court,[406] where a possessory mortgage which contravened the provisions of the Punjab Land Alienation Act, 1900, because the mortgagee was a non-agriculturist, was executed benami in favour of an agriculturist. The benamidar sued to recover possession, but his suit was dismissed, and the court held that the mortgagors were entitled to show the real nature of the transaction, and differed from a dictum of Sir Lawrence Jenkins that "a deed cannot be avoided on the ground of fraud by a party to the fraud".[407]

Where transfer is ultra vires

Contracts which are ultra vires are not necessarily illegal.[408] A contract which is ultra vires of a company is void not because it is illegal, but because the company has no power to enter into it.[409] A company may be entitled to recover money lent notwithstanding that the loan was ultra vires. In Turner v Bank of Bombay,[410] the bank was held to be entitled to recover on an equitable mortgage despite the prohibition in section 37 of the Presidency Banks Act, and in Ahmed Sail v Bank of Mysore,[411] a bank was held entitled to enforce a mortgage although its memorandum of association prohibited loans on mortgage.

(31) Section 23 of Contract Act

Under section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, a consideration or object is unlawful if (l) it is forbidden by law; or (2) is of such nature that it defeats the provisions of any law; or (3) is fraudulent; or (4) involves or implies injury to the person or property of another; (5) or the courts regard it as immoral or (6) opposed to public policy. The following are instances of transfers invalid under these heads:

Transfers of granted lands in contravention of the terms of the grant or in breach of any law; rule or regulation covering such grant will clearly be voidable. Legislature may provide that transfer of such granted lands will be void and not merely voidable, eg section 4(1) of

Karnataka Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prohibition of Transfer of Certain Lands) Act, 1978.[412]

(1) Forbidden by law

A sub-lease of a farm for the retail sale of opium is void, as the sale of opium without a licence by the Collector is forbidden by the Opium Act.[413] Transfers of occupancy land have been held to be void as being forbidden by section 9 of the North-Western Provinces Act, 1878,[414] or by section 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act, 1901.[415]

Forbidden by law does not refer to prohibition by agreement, or decree of court.[416]

(2) Defeat the provisions of any law

The following are such transfers:

A collusive assignment to a relation in expectation of insolvency to defeat the provisions of the Insolvency Act;[417] a lease granted by a mortgage under a mortgage forbidden by the Agra Tenancy Act, as the recognition of the lease would defeat the provisions of the Act;[418] a lease granted with the object of defeating the provisions of the Calcutta Rent Act;[419] a transfer by an insolvent to a creditor on condition of his not opposing his final discharge;[420] a sale-deed by an accused person to his pleader by way of indemnity for a bail bond executed by the pleader, for the indemnity renders the bail illusory.[421]

ILLUSTRATION

A owes money to B and executes a hathchitta in favour of B promising to repay the debt. B in expectation of being adjudged insolvent assigns the hathchitta to his relation C in order to prevent the debt vesting in the Official Assignee. B is adjudged insolvent but the adjudication is subsequently annulled. Nevertheless, as the Assignment was made for an illegal purpose it is void and C cannot recover the debt.[422]

(3) Fraudulent

A transfer to an agent in consideration of the agent granting a lease of land without the knowledge of his principal would be a fraud on the principal and void.[423]

(4) Injury to person or property

A payment to a Hindu father in consideration of his giving his son in adoption is void, for the adoption is liable to be set aside and the son would lose his status in both families.[424]

(5) Immoral

A lease of a house for its use as a brothel is void as the purpose is immoral;[425] but not if the lessor was not aware of the intended use.[426] A transfer of immovable property to a woman in consideration of future illicit intercourse is void;[427] but if the immoral purpose has been carried out the transfer cannot be set aside.[428] On the same principle, a bequest in a will conditional on the continuance of immoral relations is void.[429] A distinction must be made between the motive for a transaction and its purpose;[430] a transfer motivated by the transferor and transferee having cohabited in the past is without consideration and is, therefore, a gift, and is not illegal.[431]

(6) Public policy

A corrupt payment such as a bribe paid to an official is an instance of a transfer void as opposed to public policy.[432] Similarly, it is contrary to public policy to stifle a prosecution.[433] In a case of Calcutta High Court,[434] the relations of a prisoner executed a mortgage in favour of the prisoner's employer for a large part of the employer's money which the prisoner had misappropriated, in consideration of the employer agreeing not to object to the prosecution being withdrawn by the commissioner of police. The court held that the mortgage was valid, but it is clear from the judgment that the mortgage would have been invalid, if the consideration had been that the employer should himself withdraw the prosecution. The Lahore High Court has held that the purchase by apulwara of land within his circle would create an interest in conflict with his duty, and would be void as contrary to public policy.[435] The judgments of the Allahabad High Court on the same point have been conflicting.[436] A transfer of land, granted revenue, free upon a condition that the grantees and their descendants should give blessings to the Maharaja of Nepal, is not contrary to public policy.[437] Payments to a father or guardian in consideration of a daughter or ward being given in marriage have been held to be opposed to public policy.[438] It is now understood that the doctrine of public policy will not be extended beyond the classes of cases already covered by it. No court can invent a new head of public policy; it has been said in the House of Lords that "public policy is always an unsafe and treacherous ground for legal decision".

(32) Sub-clause (3)—Disqualified to be a Transferee

A transfer is defined in section 5 as an act by which one person transfers property to another. It is, therefore, necessary that the transferor should be competent to transfer as enacted in section 7; and that the transferee should be competent to be transferee as enacted in this section. Any living person is competent to be a transferee, provided he is not subject to a legal disqualification. Such a disqualification is enacted in section 136 which forbids a judge, legal practitioner or officer connected with a court from purchasing an actionable claim. Similarly, O 21, rule 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, forbids any officer or person having any duty to perform in connection with any sale from acquiring an interest in the property sold.

Minor as transferee

A minor is in English law disqualified to be a transferee of a legal estate in land, but not of an equitable interest in and or other property;[439] but in India although a minor's contract is void,[440] yet a minor is not disqualified to be a transferee[441] and a minor may be a purchaser,[442] or a mortgagee.[443] However, neither the guardian of a minor, nor his manager is competent to bind the minor or his estate by a contract for the purchase of immovable property.[444] A lease to a minor is void, as a lease imports a covenant by the minor to pay rent and other reciprocal obligations.[445] This was so decided before the amending Act 20 of 1929, and the present section 107 makes it clear that a lease to a minor must be void because it must be executed both by the lessor and the lessee.

Executive instructions requiring an official certificate of approval to a transfer do not render a person, who does not hold such certificate, legally disqualified to be a transferee.[446] A Buddhist monk is not disqualified to be a transferee.[447]

(33) Clause (i)—Untransferable Right of Occupancy

This clause was added by the amending Act 3 of 1885, and is identical with the proviso to section 108(j) exempting certain holdings from the general rule that leaseholds are transferable. In this section, it is also an exception to the general rule that property is transferable.

Some occupancy rights are inalienable either by custom or by local laws such as the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, 1878, or the Agra Tenancy Act, 1901.[448] In Motichand v Ikram Ullah,[449] the Privy Council said that the policy of the Tenancy Act, was to preserve proprietary rights from being transferred otherwise than by gift or by exchange between co-sharers, and that the Act was not to be defeated by ingenious devices or arrangements such as an arrangement to relinquish. Under that Act and under the Oudh Rent Act, 1886, a proprietor, whose proprietary rights are transferred to an outsider, is entitled to retain possession of his sir or home farm lands at a reduced statutory rent as an exproprietary tenant. In the undernoted case,[450] a proprietor was held to be entitled to this exproprietary tenancy although the rents of the sir lands had been assigned for payment of a maintenance allowance, and although the effect of the exproprietary tenancy was to reduce the amount of that allowance. The rent paid by the cultivators was received by the exproprietary tenant and the person entitled to the maintenance allowance, received only the reduced statutory rent from the exproprietary tenant. A mortgage of an occupancy holding is void under section 20 of the Agra Tenancy Act, and the mortgage is not entitled even to sue for a money decree on the basis of a personal convenant in the mortgage.[451]

Under the law as it stood before the TP Act, tenancies whether of homestead lands or of agricultural lands in Bengal were not transferable in the absence of a custom to the contrary, or of an express contract to that effect.[452] Section 2 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (Bengal Act 8 of 1885) enacts that every permanent tenure is (subject to the provisions of the Act) capable of being transferred. Tenures created after the TP Act and before the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act are transferable.[453] Non-permanent tenures created before the passing of the TP Act are not transferable.[454] By section 26B of the Bengal Tenancy Act as amended by Bengal Act 4 of 1928, the holding of an occupancy ryot in Bengal is, subject to the provisions of the Act, capable of being transferred like other immovable property. The landlord is entitled to evict as a trespasser a mortgagee of a holding that is not transferable, if the tenant has abandoned his holding.[455] Under section 87 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, a landlord is entitled to re-enter when a ryot abandons his holding. If a tenant of a non-transferable holding executes a usufructuary mortgage of his holding and leaves the village, the holding is abandoned and the landlord is entitled to treat the mortgagee as a trespasser.[456] If a co-sharer landlord purchases a non-transferable holding and takes possession, the transaction is an abandonment of the holding, and the purchasing landlord is a trespasser as to the shares of the other landlord.[457] This is also the case when the purchase is made by a stranger who afterwards acquires a share in the landlord's right.[458] A tenant with a right of occupancy under section 36 of the Oudh Rent Act, 1886, or a statutory tenant under section 5 of the said Act has a non-transferable right of occupancy which he can relinquish by the procedure of section 50 of the Act.

7. Persons competent to transfer.—Every person competent to contract and entitled to transferable property, or authorized to dispose off transferable property not his own, is competent to transfer such property either wholly or in part, and either absolutely or conditionally, in the circumstances, to the extent and in the manner, allowed and prescribed by any law for the time being in force.

(1) Competent to Transfer

Under section 6(h)(3), any person is competent to be a transferee, unless legally disqualified. This section deals with the competency of a transferor. The transferor must be—

(1) competent to contract; and

(2) have title to the property, or authority to transfer it if not his own.

(2) Competent to Contract

This is the same condition as is enacted by section 7 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 for the creation of a trust. Section 11 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872 defines capacity to contract as follows:

> Every person is competent to contract who is of the age of majority according to the law to which he is subject, and who is of sound mind, and is not disqualified from contracting by any law to which he is subject.

The power to transfer must depend upon the power to contract, for without an antecedent contract to give and take, there can be no transfer at all.

(3) Minor as a Transferor

The transferor must have attained the age of majority according to the law to which he is subject. As the conditions of validity of a mortgage must entail both parties, mortgagor and mortgagee must be competent to enter into a contract therefore, a minor, being incompetent to contract cannot be a mortgagor or mortgagee.[460] The essence of nemo dat quod non habet is the transactional exigibility i.e. the binding effect of prior property rights of subsequent transferee irrespective of notice or knowledge of prior property rights on part of subsequent transferees.[461] The Privy Council have held that a contract by a minor is void.[462] A transfer by a minor, therefore, is also void.[463] Prior to the decision of the Privy Council, it was generally assumed that a minor's contract was voidable, and could be ratified. These decisions are now obsolete, and as the contract is void there can be no question of ratification. There are many conflicting decisions as to whether a minor can be estopped by a false representation that he is of age. Before the Privy Council decision that a minor is incapable of contracting, Ameer Ali J said that the rule of estoppel was not applicable, as it would have the effect of enlarging the minor's power to contract.[464] This is supported by a dictum of the Privy Council in Mahomed Syedol Arifjin v Yeoh,[465] that the doctrine of estoppel is only applicable to persons who are sui juris, and by the English cases of Leslie Ltd v Sheill[466] and Levine v Brougham.[467] A Full Bench of the Lahore High Court has after a review of the case law come to the same conclusion.[468] In Sadiq Ali Khan v Jai Kishore,[469] the Privy Council observed that a deed executed by a minor was a nullity and incapable of founding a plea of estoppel, and following this decision, a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court has overruled its previous decisions to the contrary.[470] The principle underlying the decision of the Privy Council is that there can be no estoppel against a statute.

Although a minor is not competent to be a transferor, yet a transfer to a minor is valid.[471]

(4) Lunatic as a Transferor

Under section 12 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, a person is of sound mind for the purpose of making a contract if he is capable of understanding it, and of forming a rational judgment as to its effect upon his interests.[472] A contract made by a lunatic is void under section 11 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and so also, a transfer by him of his property is void.[473] A lunatic is competent to contract during a lucid interval, and a transfer by a lunatic during a lucid interval would be valid here as in England.[474] However, a person adjudged a lunatic would be incapable of making a transfer even during a lucid interval.[475] The unsoundness of mind may be established by proving such conduct as was not in keeping with the character of the person concerned, but such that it could not be explained on any reasonable basis. Burden to prove or establish at least on a balance of probability the transferor's action in executing transfer deed in favour of transferee was the outcome of an unsound mind, is on the person alleging so. However, unrebutted evidence of an unnatural and inexplicable animosity as well as unnatural and inexplicable fixation on selling of all his properties probabilises that the sale was effected by the transferor when he was incapable of rational behaviour. The onus then shifts to the transferee to adduce evidence either to show that the ostensibly irrational conduct of the transferee had a rational explanation, or that the conveyance was executed by the transferor in a lucid interval.[476]

Where the vendors did not have a complete title over suit property and the agreement was not executed by all co-sharers of the partly owned property, the same cannot be enforced by the vendee.[477] However, if property is transferred for a consideration in good faith without misrepresentation of fraud and transferee had taken reasonable steps to ascertain title of transferor, then such transfer would not be void.[478] Where before a mortgage is created in respect of immovable property, and borrower had already leased out the same in favour of a lessee either as the owner or as a person competent or authorised to transfer the immovable property, the lessee will have the right to enjoy the leased property in accordance with terms and conditions of lease irrespective of whether a subsequent mortgagee has knowledge of such a lease or not.[479]

Disqualified to contract

A statutory disqualification to contract imports, as in the case of a minor, inability to transfer. Such a disqualification ensues when the owner's property is under the management of the Court of Wards,[480] or of an officer appointed under Encumbered Estates Act.[481] A judgment debtor whose property is being sold in execution by the Collector is also incompetent to alienate.[482]

Authority to dispose off property

If the transferor has no title to the property, he must have authority to transfer it.[483] Also, a person holding limited estate is not competent to transfer.[484] As instances of authority to transfer the property of another, the following may be cited—an agent acting under a power of attorney; the donee of a power of appointment; the guardian of a minor duly authorised by the court in that behalf; the manager of a Hindu family in case of necessity or for the benefit of the family; the committee or manager of a lunatic; a receiver when empowered by the court; an executor or administrator having authority to dispose off the property of the deceased regulated by section 307 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925.

In all these cases, the authority is defined and limited by personal and statutory laws which are outside the scope of TP Act. The extent of the power of transfer depends upon the interest of the transferor or the limitation upon his authority. However, whether the power of transfer is limited or absolute, all transfers are subject to the general rules enacted in this chapter.

An agent, who merely manages property, has no authority to transfer it.[485] It has been held in Shakuntala Devi v State of Jharkhand,[486] that despite the statutory prohibition to execute a sale deed, the registrar has no authority to refuse registration on the ground that the vendor had no title to the property. He is under a duty to only see whether the document is duly stamped or not. A vendor cannot transfer a title or right better than what he had over that piece of land.[487] Similarly, if a court of competent jurisdiction has declared a gift deed to be valid, a party cannot be said to be lawfully in possession of land or be a deemed tenant.[488]

Person not authorised to dispose off minor's property

Where the de facto guardian of the minor's property sells it, the sale is invalid, and will be hit by section 11 of the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act. Even subsequent ratification by the natural guardian does not validate it.[489]

8. Operation of transfer.—Unless a different intention is expressed or necessarily implied, a transfer of property passes forthwith to the transferee all the interest which the transferor is then capable of passing in the property and in the legal incidents thereof.

Such incidents include, where the property is land, the easements annexed thereto, the rents and profits thereof accruing after the transfer, and all things attached to the earth; and, where the property is machinery attached to the earth, the movable parts thereof; and, where the property is a house, the easements annexed thereto, the rent thereof accruing after the transfer, and the locks, keys, bars, doors, windows, and all other things provided for permanent use therewith; and, where the property is a debt or other actionable claim, the securities thereof (except where they are also for other debts or claims not transferred to the transferee), but not arrears of interest accrued before the transfer;

and, where the property is money or other property yielding income, the interest or income thereof accruing after the transfer takes effect.

(1) Transfer Passes All Interest of Transferor

Transfer of property passes forthwith to the transferee all the interests, which the transferor is capable of passing in the property and the legal incidents thereof.[490] Conveyancing in India has never been obscured by the technicalities of English law, and the rule that a conveyance is presumed to be a transfer of all the interest that the transferor is capable of passing, though not fully established in England till 1926, was recognised in India even before the passing of the TP Act. In a case to which the TP Act was not applicable, the Privy Council said that the rule before the TP Act was that words of grant were calculated to convey all the interest of the grantor, but that it was necessary to read the whole instrument in order to gather the intention.[491] Again in Syed Ashgar v Syed Mahomed,[492] Lord Lindley said with reference to the construction of a conveyance:

> The deed of 1883 contains no words of exception or reservation, and is simple in point of language to pass all Syed Haider Reza's interest in the Zamindary, including the land on which the bazar was situated. His interest in the houses on that land, the profit and the rents derived from them, would pass by the deed in the absence of words showing an intention to retain them.

Therefore, where an owner of a grove sells the grove by declaring that he was selling it with every right that he possessed therein, it follows that his right to the land is also conveyed to the vendor, unless it is especially reserved by him.[493] Similarly, where A transfers land on which there are trees or a well, if nothing to the contrary is specified, the trees or well would pass along with the land to the buyer.[494] Even if the actual possession of the property is not with the transferor, symbolic and de jure possession can be transferred for completing a grant.[495]

The section is a rule of construction which avoids speculation as to the particular interest which was in the mind of the transferor. If he holds under two titles, eg by purchase and by inheritance, or as part owner and as executor, it will be presumed that both the interests have passed.[496] If the grantor has used unqualified words of conveyance, he cannot afterwards claim to have any rights in the property.[497] A zamindar mortgaged a taluka in some villages of which he had a sarabarakari interest subordinate to his zamindari right. The deed made no reference to the subordinate interest and in the absence of an express reservation, the mortgage was held to include the sarabarakari interest also.[498] This section is not intended to lay down any rule as to what words are necessary to effect a transfer of any particular kind of property. What property is actually conveyed by a particular kind of deed depends on its own terms.[499] Where, on a construction of a document transferring title to hold a property, it is clear that the intention of the parties was to transfer a parcel of land within well-defined boundaries, any erroneous statement of survey number or omission to state it should be rejected as false demonstration.[500] However, wherever there is any misdescription of the property, the real intention of the party has to be gathered from the surrounding circumstances as well as the sale deed. Though it is not an inexorable principle of law, but ordinarily, it is said that depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case, whenever there is a conflict in the description of the property in a sale deed or any other instrument so far as plot number, khata number and boundaries are concerned, generally speaking, the boundaries are to prevail. Similar opinion was expressed by the Supreme Court in Sheodhyan Singh v Sanichara Kuer,[501] wherein it was held that whenever there is any misdescription ordinarily, the description as per the boundaries may be preferred to represent the correct intentions of the parties.[502] Where there is a grant of a mining lease and a map is annexed to the grant showing an area lesser than what is stated in the grant, the terms of the grant must prevail over the map.[503]

With regard to operation of transfer of property, the term of exemption provided in the special law shall apply if clear and unambiguous.[504] A registered settlement deed cannot be subsequently cancelled by executing a cancellation deed. The deed can be cancelled only by the court upon proof that it was executed through fraud, undue influence mistake or any other ground accepted by the court and not by the settler unilaterally.[505] In Vitthal Maharu Patil v Fakira Bhavsing Patil,[506] a registered sale deed was executed in favour of the transferee and possession was handed over to him. After around a gap of 12 years, the transferor alleged that along with the sale deed a deed of reconveyance was also executed in his favor. It was held that the claim would be negated in absence of any endorsement of reconveyance or a registered sale receipt.

With reference to section 8, it has been held that where there is a purported deed of adoption which fails as such deed, it can be treated as a will, if such an intention can be ascertained from the deed.[507] Rajasthan High Court has held that where a person has purchased the plot of land from a private citizen who was the owner of the land and by such purchase of land, all the rights of the former owner have been transferred to the purchaser, the purchaser would be entitled to all the rights referred in section 8 and section 55(6)(a). Therefore, no conversion charges can be demanded by the government if the purchaser wants to change the use of land.[508]

If the purchaser of land within a scheme area constructed a building thereon knowing well about the execution of scheme, he cannot demand shifting or diversion of transmission line at a belated stage. In Orissa Power Transmission Corporation Ltd v Asia School of Management Trust,[509] after 14 ½ years of publication of Scheme, a parcel of land within scheme area was purchased from its owner by the Trust. It was held that the Trust which constructed building thereon knowing well about execution of scheme by erecting towers in area including the land, cannot demand shifting/diversion of transmission line at a belated stage.

(2) Where Transferor is Both Part Owner and Executor

An executor has the right to sell the property of the testator in due course of administration. If an executor is also one of the beneficiaries, and he sells the property of the testator together with "all the estate, right, title and interest" of the vendor, the deed conveys the whole title vested in the executor, and not merely his beneficial interest, though he does not purport to convey in his capacity as executor.[510] If the executant had an absolute title, then, it has to be inferred that the executant conveyed his absolute title to the person in whose favour the document was executed.[511]

(3) Hindu Law

The Hindu law is the same, for under that law an absolute estate may be conveyed without the words of limitation formerly used in English law to convey an estate of inheritance; and whether the gift passes an absolute or a limited estate, depends upon the terms of the grant.[512] However, if the donee is a female relation who takes a limited estate in property inherited, the Privy Council in Mahomed Shumsool v Shewukram[513] held that the court is entitled to assume, where the property given is immovable, that the donor intended her to take a limited estate only, and in such cases it has been said that the principle of section 8 is not of much practical utility.[514] However, of course, an absolute estate may be conferred upon a woman by express words indicating full proprietary rights.[515] The use of the word malik imports an absolute heritable and alienable estate,[516] unless the context indicates a different meaning.[517] It was supposed at one time by some of the courts in India that, under the Hindu law, in case of immovable property given or devised by a husband to his wife, the wife had no power to alienate, unless the power of alienation was conferred upon her in express terms. However, it has been held by decisions of the Privy Council that the proposition was not sound, and that if words of sufficient amplitude were used conferring the absolute ownership upon the wife, the wife enjoyed the rights of ownership without their being conferred by express and additional terms, unless the circumstances or the context were sufficient to show that such absolute ownership was not intended.[518]

In the case of a transfer for consideration to a wife by a Hindu, the Privy Council applied section 8 even before the amendment of section 2, and held that the donee took an absolute estate.[519] A person executed a settlement deed, transferring certain properties in favour of P and directed that the property shall be enjoyed by P and after her lifetime, by S. S and his widow G sued for possession of the properties settled in favour of P. It was held, that subject to the life interest of P, S (the husband of G) had been given absolute estate. The document did not show that P was given absolute interest. S, during his lifetime, acquired a vested right in the properties, which could not be defeated by his death before he obtained possession.[520] Even in a family settlement, a restraint on alienation of the property is void. Sections 10 to 14 of the TP Act (and the corresponding provisions of the Indian Succession Act) are statutory recognitions of the principles, that to impose total restraint on transfer or to impose restrictions which keep the property out of circulation forever, offends public policy, irrespective of whether such conditions are imposed by a deed or transfer, a will, or a simple contract. A contract against public policy is void. Therefore, such restrictive clauses in a family settlement are inoperative.[521] Even though the document may use the word "surrender" and even though it may be styled as a "release" yet, if it transfers all the right, title and interests of the person executing it in favour of person accepting it, then it is a sale, if executed for consideration.[522]

Where trust deeds conferring similar interest on grandsons in respect of properties of creators of trusts, were executed respectively by a male member and female member of a Hindu family, it was held that the principles of Hindu law governing the devolution of property in case of property passing from father to his son and grandsons, cannot be invoked in such a case.

In the above case, the trust deeds (i) gave properties of the executants of the deeds to grandsons in equal shares on the happening of a particular event; (ii) conferred, on the trustees, a right to exercise an absolute and uncontrolled discretion (on the death of a beneficiary before the happening of the event) to apply the beneficiary's share towards the maintenance of his widow and his male issue, and to accumulate the surplus to the account of the said beneficiary for distribution; and (iii) also provided, that if, before the time of division and distribution of properties, a beneficiary died, leaving only a widow, the widow would get a half of the share belonging to the deceased beneficiaries, and the heirs of other deceased beneficiaries. It was held that the above conditions were sufficient, in themselves, to lead to the conclusion that it was never intended that the properties should pass to the beneficiaries, to be held by them for their respective Hindu undivided families. On the plain terms of the trust deed, the properties were intended to devolve, on the beneficiaries in their individual capacity.[523] A settlement deed is not defined under the TP Act. It is disposition of the property either for the purpose of settling disputes among the family, or for religious purposes, or in consideration of marriage.[524]

(4) Court Sales

The section does not apply to court sales, for such sales effect a transfer by the operation of law.[525] The principle of the section was, however, applied in a case decided by Madras High Court[526] where a debt for unpaid purchase money on a sale of land was attached and sold, and the auction purchaser was held entitled to the charge which the vendor had under section 55(4)(b) on the property in the hands of the buyer. The court, after observing that the present section did not apply to court sales, said:

The effect of applying section 8 is to strengthen the sale certificate by transferring the lien along with it.

It is difficult to follow this line of reasoning, and these dicta have been treated as obiter in a later case,[527] wherein J Madhavan Nair said that section 8 could not override the provisions of the Registration Act, 1908. It is submitted that section 8 cannot apply to court sales. What is sold at a court sale is the right, title and interest of the judgment debtor, and the extent of that interest is a mixed question of fact and law to be decided according to the circumstances of each particular case, and depends upon what the court intended to sell, and the purchaser intended to buy.[528] Thus, a court sale of a judgment debtor's interest in property which has been leased, passes rents accrued due at the time of sale, not because rents are incidental to the land, but because the rents were part of the judgment debtor's interest.[529] Similarly, an execution sale of a zamindari estate will pass buildings in the zamindari area which are appurtenant to the estate[530] and were, therefore, included in the sale, but not indigo factories which though in the estate are not appurtenant thereto.[531]

Revenue sales under the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, 1859 stand on a different footing, for the interest of the defaulting proprietor in the land is forfeited or determined, and what is sold is the interest of the government subject to the payment of assessment.[532] Accordingly, if he has erected a building on the land, the right to the building would not pass, and he would be entitled to remove the materials, unless the purchaser elected to pay compensation for the building.[533] This is in accordance with the general rule laid down in the case of Thakoor Chunder v Ramdhone.[534]

(5) Different Intention

The general presumption is in favour of a transfer of all the interests of the transferor. A mortgages a mango tree standing on his land to B. A then sells the land to C, and the sale-deed makes no mention of the mortgage. It cannot be inferred that A's interest in the tree did not pass with the sale to C.[535]

The presumption of a transfer of all the interest can be rebutted by express words or by necessary implication. The words "lease" and "mortgage" of themselves express an intention of transferring an interest less than the transferor is capable of passing. The words "mokarari lease with all rights" express the intention to pass all rights which can be passed by way of lease, but short of an absolute title and the lessee would take permanent lease, but not with subsoil rights in the minerals, for the essential characteristic of a lease is that the corpus does not disappear and minerals must be expressly denominated so as thus to permit the idea of partial consumption of the subject leased.[536]

In interpretation of agreements, redundant and inapplicable clauses should be ignored in standardized forms adopted by insurance companies, statutory corporations and banks.[537] In construing the terms of the contract of insurance, the words expressed by the parties must be given paramount importance.[538]

The words of the document describing the property must be given due weight. Thus, where it is stated in the deed of settlement that the widow conveyed the property which had passed to her under her husband's will, and the will was invalid, being one executed by a Hindu who had a son living at the time, it cannot be argued that she conveyed also her interest in the property as heir of the son. The recitals showed that the intention was not to transfer all the interest which she was capable of passing, but only the interest acquired under her husband's will. Thus, the deed showed a "different intention" within the meaning of section 8.[539]

Again, the circumstances of the case may be such as to disclose an intention to restrict the transfer to an interest under one title only. Thus, in Har Prasad v Fazal Ahmed,[540] a Mahomedan sold two villages to his mother, and left a substantial part of the purchase money with her to be spent in charity. On his death, the mother spent some money in charity and then settled the villages in wakf, subject to a charge for the amount actually paid plus the amount spent in charity. The sale was set aside as being merely a cloak for a gift in fraud of the heirs. The wakf fell with the sale, but it was contended that as the mother was entitled to a third share of the villages as heir to her son, the wakf was operative as to that third share. However, the Privy Council held that the reservation of a charge for what she had paid and spent, showed that the mother had no intention of settling anything of her own or anything except what she thought had been entrusted to her by her son.

An intention to reserve a right may be implied not only from the terms of the deed, but also from the object of the grant. Thus a gift of certain talukas "in order that you may perform those religious ceremonies, celebrate the festivals satisfactorily and may provide for your own support by having the property under your authority and control" was held to confer a life-estate, the Privy Council observing that "the indefinite words of the gift must be limited by the purpose of the gift".[541] In a kharposh gift which is only a grant for life, an intention to reserve mineral rights is implied.[542] Where the proviso in a lease deed is void as it is unauthorised and the effect of declaring the proviso void will be to leave the rest of the deed whole and intact, the lease without the proviso is valid.[543] The different intention may be also to transfer an interest greater than the transferor possesses at the time, and if the property is sold free from encumbrances, the vendor is bound to discharge encumbrances then existing on the property.

(6) Legal Incidents

The second clause refers to land and defines what is included in its "legal incidents". An incident is defined in Wharton's Law Lexicon as "a thing necessarily depending upon, appertaining to, or following another that is more worthy—as rent is incidental to a reversion". The provisions as to legal incidents in the second, third, and fourth paras of this section correspond to section 6 of the Conveyancing and the Law of Property Act, 1881,[544] where a more detailed list is given. The list in this section is not exhaustive as is shown by the use of the word "includes".

The following are the legal incidents which pass upon the transfer of property to which they relate:

> The benefit of a covenant which runs with the land under section 55(2); or section 65; or section 108(c); a right under section 55(3) to possession of title deeds;[545] and a right of pre-emption.[546]

(7) Construction of Deeds

A document has to be construed as a whole. Real intention of the parties has to be gathered, not merely from what ex facie is stated as the description of the property in the schedule, but from the totality of the recitals in the document. Description of the property in the schedule to the document could not be given any overriding importance over the actual area specified in the document as the extent of the land determined upon measurement.[547] The construction of a document as regards the legal effects will only arise where the document is an instrument of title, or is a contract, or is the direct foundation of legal rights. Where the nature and character of the document are clear, and the only question or dispute is whether the real contract is between the parties is something different from that contained in the document, no question of the construction of the document is involved. There can be no doubt that where the language is plain and unambiguous, the same is to be adhered to.[548] The construction of a document depends upon the language of the recitals, but not upon its form or nomenclature. The intention of the executant is to be gathered from the words used in the document. To find out whether a document is settlement, gift or a will, the nature of a document has to be examined whether it transferred any interest in property in praesenti, or after the death of the executant. A sale deed that is totally silent on any aspect of reconveyance and pursuant to sale possession was delivered to the buyer, the transfer would amount to a sale and the seller would not be entitled to any reconveyance.[549] A mere delivery of possession cannot amount to transfer of interest in the property.

(8) Easements Annexed Thereto

An "easement" is defined in section 4 of the Indian Easements Act, 1882.[550] The phrase "easements annexed thereto" refers to those easements which at and prior to the transfer were existing easements. It does not refer to an easement which first came into existence as a consequence of transfer.

Under section 19 of the Indian Easements Act, 1882, an easement existing at the date of the transfer passes with the dominant heritage to the transferee. A purchaser of a house acquires a right of way which the vendor has.[551] The illustration to section 19 of the Easements Act, 1882 is that if A owns land to which a right of way is annexed and leases it to B for 20 years, the right of way would vest in B and his legal representatives for so long as the lease continues. A purchaser of land irrigated by the water of a tank is entitled to use the water of the tank for irrigation."[552]

The words "locks, keys, bars" refer to permanent fixtures and fittings. The words "other thing provided" do not include a right of access by a staircase, when the ownership of the staircase itself is not claimed, and the right of way is not an easement of necessity.[553]

Apart from legal easements other rights called quasi-easements are created on the severance of property. As to these, section 13 of the Indian Easements Act, 1882, enacts that on partition the grant of an easement of necessity or of an apparent continuous easement shall be implied. The word "annexed" is used in the same sense as the word "appurtenant" in English law,[554] and indicates that the right is the right of the owner for the time being. The right to a ferry franchise is not necessarily annexed to the land.[555]

Where a common passage was left for the use of the co-sharers in a partition between the members of one family, it was held that such an arrangement did not make the right to a share in the passage a legal incident of the shares allotted to co-sharers.[556] A purchaser of land cannot claim use of water in a well-constructed in a separate and distinct land. A decree for permanent injunction being one granted for protection of the decree-holder's statutory easementary right of way appurtenant to his dominant heritage and annexed with the servient tenement of the judgment-debtors, is enforceable in law against the transferee-judgment-debtor, he being the successor-in-interest of the original judgment-debtor.[557]

(9) Rents and Profits

Rents and profits accrue after the transfer of benefits arise out of the land and are, therefore, within the definition of immovable property. The rents and profits of property mortgaged by an English mortgage form part of the mortgagee's security.[558] A buyer's right to rents and profits, therefore, accrues on the date of the transfer. This is made clear by section 55(4)(a) under which the seller is entitled to the rents and profits of the property until ownership passes to the buyer, and also section 55(6)(a) which declares the buyer entitled to rents and profits when the ownership of the property passes to him. At a court sale, the property vests at the date of sale and so the auction purchaser is entitled to the crops grown between the date of sale and the date of confirmation of the sale.[559] If the vendor retains possession after the ownership has passed to the buyer, he may be charged for use and occupation. Rents and profits accruing due before the transfer are not legal incidents of the property transferred.[560] Such arrears of rent are a debt or an actionable claim, and if they are to be transferred, they must be assigned separately.[561] Where additions and alteration in the suit premises were carried out in pren[illegible] prior to the premises coming into the hands of the original landlord, the landlord cannot pass a better title than what he has and his transferee cannot seek eviction of tenant on grounds of alteration of premises.[562]

(10) Attached to the Earth

This phrase is defined in section 3 of TP Act. What is attached to the earth is immovable property within the definition of the term in the General Clauses Act. What is attached to the earth is part of the land, and passes with it on transfer without express mention.[563] In the case of a lease, the right to enjoy the trees and shrubs passes to the lessee.[564] Trees on an occupancy holding, which is inalienable, are attached to the holding, and cannot be transferred by the occupancy holder.[565] A house, being embedded in the earth, is immovable property,[566] and when the land is transferred, buildings erected upon it pass by necessary implication.[567] However, the owner of the land may not necessarily be the owner of its superstructure,[568] nor would the subsoil rights form a part of surficial rights of land if the contract so says.[569] It was held in Ashok Kumar v Chief Controlling Revenue Authority,[570] that where the owner of the land executed a lease of the land in favor of B for 30 years for construction of a hotel, the ownership rights of this Hotel were not with the owner of the land, but vested in B. It has been held by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court, disapproving an earlier Allahabad judgment,[571] that it is a question of fact in each case whether the transfer of an interest in a zamindari also transfers an interest in a residential house.[572] In case of an auction sale of only the land or a plot, the house built thereupon does not automatically get transferred by virtue of section 8.[573] Similarly, a sale of land would pass ownership only in the land and not of the hotel constructed on it by the lessee with the permission of the owner.[574] All things which are annexed to the property mortgaged are part of the mortgagee's security, and the mortgage need not make mention of structures and fixtures.,[575] but an iron shed resting on the land by its own weight is not attached to the earth, and is a mere chattel which does not pass on transfer of the land.[576]

Unless a different intention is expressed, a transfer of land would include trees standing on it.[577] However, no transfer of land can be presumed from transfer of trees.[578] Failure to mention saplings in the agreement to sell the land, was held to indicate that they were not intended to be sold.[579]

(11) Minerals

Minerals are embedded in the earth, and pass on sale of the land. In Raja Anand v State of Uttar Pradesh,[580] the Supreme Court observed that prima facie the owner of the surface is entitled ex jure to everything beneath the land, and held that a transfer of the right to the surface conveys the right to the minerals underneath, unless there is an express or implied reservation in the grant. Whether a lease passes a right to sub-soil minerals depends on the terms of the grant.[581] A permanent lease by a Bengal zamindar does not imply a grant of mineral rights.[582] In Ali Quadar v Jogendra,[583] JJ Prinsep and Hill held that a grant of a patni taluka transfers mineral rights. The Judicial Committee intimated in one case that this decision had not been overruled,[584] and it has since been followed.[585] However, the point is now settled against the patnidar, for in Bejoy Singh Dudhorin v Surendra Narayan Singh[586] the Judicial Committee have held that even in the case of a patni tenure the onus is on the patnidar to prove the inclusion of subsoil rights in the grant. As between zamindar and jagirdar, it is well-settled that the zamindar must be regarded as the owner of the minerals.[587]

In Raja Anand v State of Uttar Pradesh State,[588] the Supreme Court applied the same general principle in construing a sanad granted by the government creating a zamindari and held that as the object was to make the zamindar the owner of the soil, he was entitled to the minerals. It is submitted that this decision was given on the peculiar facts of the case, and was based on the language of the particular sanad and the subsequent conduct of the parties, and does not affect the general principle stated in earlier editions of this work that if the grantor is the government, there is a presumption that mineral rights are reserved.

(12) Machinery as to the Third clause

The section assumes that the machinery is attached to the earth and is, therefore, a fixture, and then enacts that the movable parts of the machine, although they are detachable, pass with the land and the fixed machine. This is an illustration of the principle stated by Lord Hardwicke in Lawton v Lawton[590] that "you shall not destroy the principal thing, by taking away the accessory to it."

(13) House

The fourth clause merely repeats in regard to a house what has already been enacted in the first and second clauses as to property generally. If the property transferred is a house, the easements annexed to it will also pass not only under this section, but also under section 19 of the Easements Act, 1882. The transferee is also entitled to rents and profits accruing after the transfer. Locks, bars, keys doors and windows have no separate existence from the house.[591]

(14) Debts

The fifth clause relates to debts and other actionable claims. The transfer of a debt or actionable claim raises a presumption that the security for the debt has been transferred. The assignment of the debt will, unless a different intention is expressed or implied, draw the securities after it according to the maxim omne principale trahitadse accessorium.[592] The transfer of a debt passes all interest the transferor may have to recover the debt. A promissory note is sometimes described as a security for the debt, but the expression is inaccurate, for a promissory note if not itself the contract of loan, is a conditional payment of the debt. If a mortgagee holds a promissory note for a part of the debt, and retains it after transferring the mortgagee, he will be restrained from suing on it pending a suit for redemption.[593] However, a bona fide endorsee for value of the note without notice of the mortgage will be entitled to recover on it.[594] Where what is transferred is not the debt, but the property in the promissory note, the section does not apply.[595]

The question arose in a case before the Supreme Court[596] as to whether the transferee of the entire assets of a company including the right to continue a suit filed by the company obtained, by reason of section 8, the right to obtain a decree in the said suit. Justice Das, (as he then was) held that no decree was in existence at the date of transfer, and that section 8 was inapplicable as it only refers to property in existence at the time of transfer. Justice Bhagwati, who concurred in the result held, however, that in such cases there was, by the transfer of the debt, "necessarily involved also, a transfer of the transferor's right in a decree which may be passed in his favour in pending litigation and the moment a decree is passed in his favour by the court of law, that decree is also automatically transferred in favour of the transferee by virtue of the assignment in writing already executed by the transferor." Justice Imam who was the third Judge on the Bench, expressed no opinion on this point.[597]

The rule in this section is distinct from the doctrine of subrogation enacted in section 92 by which a co-debtor or a surety is subrogated to the creditor he has paid off. However, the exception made in the parenthesis is similar to that in the last para of section 92. For just as there is no subrogation when a mortgage is partially paid off, so there is no transfer of a security on the payment of a debt when the security covers other debts also.

(15) Mortgage Debts

Before mortgage debts were excluded from the definition of actionable claims, the assignment of the mortgage debt carried with it an assignment of the mortgage security.[598] However, since mortgage debts have been excluded from the definition by Act 2 of 1900, section 8 no longer applies, for the word "debt" in this section must be confined to such debts as fall within the general definition of actionable claims.[599] A mortgage being immovable property can only be transferred by a registered instrument.[600]

In Perumal v Perumal,[601] CJ Wallis said that although a debt secured by a written mortgage could not be assigned without a registered deed, yet in the case of a promissory note secured by an equitable mortgage, the endorsement of the note operates to carry the security with it. The authorities cited were Cunniah v Gopala Chettiars[602] and Nataraja v The South Indian Bank.[603] The authorities do not, however, support the conclusion. In the first case, the note was endorsed merely for collection and in the second case, the mortgage debt was attached and sold in execution. Although a mortgage debt is immovable property under the TP Act, yet it is treated in some cases as movable property under the Code of Civil Procedure 1908—(O 21, rules 45 and 54)—so that if a mortgage debt is attached and sold, the purchaser acquires not only the debt, but also the right to realise it by enforcement of the mortgage.[604] Nevertheless, in principle there is no reason to differentiate between a written mortgage and a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds and the dictum of CJ Wallis was dissented from in Elumalai v Balakrishna[605] where it was held that the assignment of a debt secured by a deposit of title-deeds does not pass the security in the absence of a registered assignment of the mortgage.

In the case last cited J Krishnan said:

> In my view, it is only if a mortgage debt is transferred as a secured debt that it will carry the securities with it on the principle embodied in section 8, and not otherwise. Even in the case of a mortgage where there is no promissory note it cannot, I think, be said that the law does not allow the mortgagee to transfer the debt as an unsecured or simple debt without a registered instrument if he thinks fit to do so. The security is for his benefit and he can give it up if he likes; and the transferee will then get the right to the debt, but not to the security. Thus, as regards transferability in law as an unsecured debt, a mortgage for which a negotiable instrument has been taken does not seem to me to differ fundamentally from one where none such has been taken. In my view, in either ease' if the debt is transferred by endorsement or otherwise, without the transferor taking care to transfer the mortgage right by registered instrument, the debt and the security will get dissociated and the security may possibly cease.[606]

In Imperial Bank of India v Bengal National Bank,[607] the Privy Council went further. The Calcutta High Court had held that a transfer of a mortgage debt failed for want of a registered assignment, but the Privy Council held that the transfer might be treated as the transfer of a debt dissociated from the security, and that it was capable of being transferred under section 6 of the TP Act. Their Lordships considered that the debt divorced from the security was not an actionable claim, but a species of property for the transfer of which no specific mode was provided in the TP Act so that the transferee had to sue in the name of the transferor.

The question of the transfer of a mortgage debt was again considered in the case of Fanny Skinner v Bank of Upper India.[608] Fanny Skinner had borrowed money from the bank secured by a simple mortgage. The bank went into liquidation, and the liquidator as part of an arrangement of reconstruction executed an unregistered agreement transferring the mortgage debt to a trust. The liquidator then sued to enforce the mortgage. It was held that the agreement had not been completed and that as no transfer had been effected, the liquidator was entitled to sue. In the course of the case an interesting argument was raised and disposed of. It was contended that the agreement being unregistered, it operated as a transfer of the debt, but not of the security, so that the bank was left without the debt but with the security, and that the bank having lost the debt could not enforce the security. This was said to be the effect of the decision in Imperial Bank of India v Bengal National Bank.[609] Their Lordships explained that that case did not lead to so extraordinary a result. In that case, the mortgage debt were due to the Bengal bank and had been mortgaged by that bank to debenture holders.

The debenture holders could recover from the Bengal bank the moneys they had lent to the bank, and for the security of which the Bengal bank had transferred the mortgage debts due to itself. However, it was only if the debenture holders proceeded to realize the mortgage debts due to the Bengal bank that it was necessary for them to sue in the name of that bank.

(16) Debt Secured by a Charge

A debt secured by a charge is not a mortgage debt, and may be transferred as an actionable claim by an unregistered instrument. A charge differs from a mortgage in that it does not transfer an interest in property, but creates a right to payment out of the property specified.[610] Nevertheless, it falls within section 17 of the Registration Act, 1908 and the assignment of a charge must be by registered instrument.[611] An unregistered assignment of a debt to which a charge was annexed would pass the debt, but not the charge. This is the effect of the decision of the Madras High Court in Rajagopala v Ranganatha.[612] Although in that case the assignment had been construed as an express assignment of the charge as well as the debt, it is submitted that this makes no difference for even if the assignment is not an express assignment of the charge, but merely operates as such an assignment, it comes within section 17(1)(b) of the Registration Act, 1908. In a judgment in an earlier stage of the case last cited, J Madhavan Nair said that section 8 of the TP Act cannot override the provisions of the Registration Act, 1908.[613] Another Madras case must be distinguished, for it referred to a sale certificate which does not require registration.[614] The authority of that judgment is also impaired by an incorrect statement that an assignment of a charge need not be by registered instrument.[615] A case of Calcutta High Court also referred to the assignment of a charge with the debt, but the question of registration was not considered.[616]

(17) Decree

A decree is not an actionable claim, and a purchaser of a money decree for a secured debt cannot be behind the decree and enforce the security.[617]

(18) Interest on Debt

As to the sixth clause—the right of the transferee to the interest or income accrues from the date of the transfer in the same way as the right to rent and profits referred to in the second clause of the section. A transfer of shares, securities and promissory notes carries with it the right to future dividends and interest. If a debt is transferred, interest accruing after the date of the transfer passes as a legal incident of the property transferred, but not arrears of interest. If the debt is time-barred, the court cannot award interest, for interest is an accessory and when the principal is barred, the accessory falls along with it.[618]

(19) Possession

The maxim "possession follows title" is applicable in cases where proof of actual possession cannot reasonably be expected, for instance, in the case of waste lands, or where nothing is known about possession one-way or another. Presumption of title as a result of possession, can arise only where facts disclose that no title vests in any party.

9. Oral Transfer.—A transfer of property may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by law.

Synopsis

(1) Oral transfer

Writing was not necessary under the Hindu law for the validity of any transfer whatsoever,[619] and in all ancient systems of law, transfer of possession was the only requisite to the transfer of title. The TP Act makes writing necessary in the case of a sale of tangible immovable property of the value of ₹100 or upwards, or the sale of a reversion or other intangible thing;[620] in the case of a simple mortgage, and in the case of all other mortgages (except a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds) when the principal sum secured is ₹100 or upwards;[621] in the case of a lease if it is from year to year, or for any term exceeding one year or reserving a yearly rent;[622] and in the case of all gifts of immovable property;[623] and of all transfers of actionable claims.[624] Exchanges are subject to the same rule as sales;[625] and the law as to leases is subject to rules which the local government are empowered to make.[626]

Where the TP Act requires a registered instrument, the transfer cannot be effected in any other way. An unregistered deed of gift of immovable property does not effect a transfer.[627] A petition to the Collector admitting a transfer, or recitals in another deed or mutation of names or delivery of possession will not affect a transfer, if the TP Act requires a registered deed.[628] A transfer of title requires a conveyance, and this cannot be given effect by a mere agreement.[629] The Oudh Chief Court has held that a grant by way of guzara, being only a right to enjoy the usufruct, need not be made in writing,[630] but the correctness of this decision is doubtful.

Where the law requires a transfer to be made in writing an oral transfer will not convey any right from the transferor to the transferee,[631] but if no writing is required by the TP Act, the transfer may be made orally.[632] Thus, a partition of joint family property,[633] the relinquishment of a right by a joint family member,[634] a surrender of a lease,[635] a release by a mother of her interest in joint family property,[636] a grant of land for life in discharge of a claim for maintenance, an assignment of immovable property under a court's decree passed on the basis of a family settlement contained in a composite deed,[637] may be made orally.[638] Even though an oral agreement to sell is possible, the onus is on the person who pleads such oral sale agreement. As an unregistered document is unenforceable in the eyes of law for the transfer of property,[639] an assignment deed that conveys title in property for more than Rs 100/ must be registered.[640]

A contract to settle property in consideration of marriage need not be in writing.[641] In Imperial Bank of India v Bengal National Bank,[642] CJ Rankin said that partition, release and surrender are all forms of transfer, but that so far as the TP Act is concerned, they come under no restriction. A right to recover a share of immovable property may be relinquished orally, and without an instrument in writing.[643] Oral transfers are valid in Punjab outside the cantonment and municipal limits.[644]

(2) Part Performance

The doctrine of part performance is an encroachment on the rule that when the Act prescribes the mode of transfer, the transfer may not be made in any other way. The doctrine is now enacted in section 53A and explained in the notes to that section.

10. Condition Restraining Alienation.—Where property is transferred subject to a condition or limitation absolutely restraining the transferee or any person claiming under him from parting with or disposing off his interest in the property, the condition or limitation is void, except in the case of a lease where the condition is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him:

Provided that property may be transferred to or for the benefit of a woman (not being a Hindu, Muhammadan or Buddhist), so that she shall not have power during her marriage to transfer or charge the same or her beneficial interest therein.

(1) Principle Underlying the Section

The principle underlying this section is that a right of transfer is incidental to, and inseparable from, the beneficial ownership of property. An absolute restraint on that power is repugnant to the nature of the estate, and an exception to the very essence of the grant.[645] In

Coke upon Littleton, it is said—Also, if a feoffment be made upon this condition, that the feoffee shall not alien the land to any, this condition is void, because when a man is infeoffed of lands or tenements, he hath power to alien them to any person by the law. For if such a condition should be good, then the condition should oust him of all the power which the law gives him, which should be against reason, and therefore such a condition is void.[646] Re Parry and Daggs,[647] LJ Fry said:

> From the earliest times the courts have always leant against any device to render an estate inalienable. It is the policy of the law always to make estates alienable, and it is immaterial by what device it is attempted to prevent an owner from exercising the power of ownership.

In Metcalfe v Metcalfe[648] J Kekewich said:

> You cannot limit an estate to a man and his heirs until he shall convey the land to a stranger, because it is of the essence of an estate in fee that it confers free power of alienation, and it has long been settled that the same principle is applicable to gifts of personality.

The section incorporates a rule of justice, equity and goods conscience, and governs transfers to which the TP Act does not apply.[649] The High Court of Karnataka has held that a grant made by government (or by its authorised officer) in accordance with law, cannot be treated as a "transfer" within the meaning of section 5. Hence, section 10 of the TP Act or the rule against perpetuities does not apply to government grants. Accordingly, a permanent restraint on the alienation of the grant, if authorised by the law applicable to such grant, is valid.[650]

Illustrations

(1) A, B, C and D effected a partition of joint family property, and agreed that if any one of them should have no issue, he would have no power to sell his share but should leave it for the other sharers. A sold his share and died without issue, B, C and D sued to recover the share. The court held that the condition was void as repugnant to one of the legal incidents of property.[651]

(2) The testator devised an absolute estate to his son provided always that if the son, his heirs or devisees, or any person claiming through or under him or them desired to sell the estate in the lifetime of the testator's wife, she should have the option to purchase the estate for £3000. The value of the estate was £15000. The court held that this was an absolute restraint on alienation in the widow's lifetime and void.[652]

(2) Transfer Subject to a Condition or Limitation

The condition referred to in this section must be a condition subsequent as defined in section 31 which divests an estate which has already vested. "Condition" must be distinguished from "limitation." The word "limitation" is a term of English law. It refers to words used in a conveyance to limit or define the nature of the estate created.

In Indian law, the question whether the words are words of limitation or words of purchase is a matter of construction. Thus, if the bequest is to "A and his heirs" the words "and his heirs" are words of limitation indicating that A has an absolute estate, but if the bequest is to "A for life and after his death to his heirs" the heirs are direct objects of an independent and distinct gift.[653] In an Indian will, the words putra poutradi krama are words of limitation denoting an estate of inheritance.[654] In Madhavrao v Balahhai,[655] the property was settled in trust for "my daughter K during her life...and after her death in trust for the male heirs of the said K". It was contended that this was an attempt to create an estate tail which was bad under the Hindu law, but the Privy Council held that it was an independent gift to the person, who answered the description of heirs at the death of K, i.e., her sons living at her death. Words of limitation which denote an estate of inheritance do not of course imply a restriction on alienation.[656]

If there is a valid transfer, the condition in restraint of alienation is void, and the transfer stands. Thus, a bequest of an absolute estate subject to a condition that neither the devisee, nor his heirs should alienate the estate except for religious purposes is a valid bequest, but the condition is void for repugnancy.[657] However, limitations may be such as to create an estate not recognized by law, and if that is the case, the transfer fails. This distinction was made by the Privy Council in Tagore v Tagore,[658] where the testator attempted to create an estate in tail not recognized by Hindu law, with the result that the donee took an estate for life, and the heir at law succeeded to the estate at his death.

(3) Absolute Restraint on Transfer

A restraint on alienation may be absolute or partial. An absolute restraint is void,[659] a partial restraint is not.[660]

The section says that a condition which absolutely restrains the power of alienation is void. Re Macleuy,[661] MR Jessel said that whether the condition took away the whole power of alienation substantially, was a question of substance, not of form thus, Re Rosher, Rosher v Rosher,[662] the testator devised an absolute estate to his son with a proviso that if he sold during the lifetime of his wife, she should have an option of purchasing the estate at a price which was one-fifth of the market value. This was held to be in effect an absolute restraint, and void. A similar case was Re Elliot, Kelly v Elliot[663] where a tea plantation was devised absolutely, but a condition was annexed that if the devisee should sell the plantation "I will direct her to pay to my brother the sum of £1,000 out of the proceeds of such sale, also the further sum of £500 out of the proceeds of such sale to (her sister)"— the direction was held to be repugnant and void as a restraint on alienation. A provision in a partition deed prohibiting alienation of the property allotted absolutely to each coparcener without the consent of the other sharers is invalid as an absolute restraint.[664] A condition in the Will, that the legatee is prohibited from alienating his property would be void and the legatee would be empowered to ignore the condition and sell the property to whomsoever he likes.[665] Where a husband settled property on his wives, but subject to a condition that they could not alienate without his consent, the condition was held to be void under this section.[666] The same rule has been applied in Punjab where the TP Act is not in force.[667] After sale of land under a registered sale deed, there was an agreement immediately thereafter between the vendor and the vendee, to the effect that vendee or his heirs will not alienate or dissipate or fritter away the land. It was held that the agreement violated section 10 of TP Act and section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. As the agreement was unregistered, it did not revoke the sale (section 92, proviso, Indian Evidence Act, 1872). Bar of estoppel or waiver would not operate against the vendee.[668]

In terms of section 10 any condition in respect of use of the land is void. Thus where land was sold to the state government subject to the condition that it would be used only for the purpose of establishing a university, but the alienee transferred the land to PUDA for development of a residential complex, the erstwhile landowner who had parted with their land and accepted compensation more than a decade earlier could not be permitted to dispute the transfer of land.[669]

(4) Restrictions for a Particular Time

As to restrictions for a particular time the case of Rosher v Rosher,[670] shows that a condition restraining alienation during a lifetime is invalid.

(5) Partial Restraint on Transfer

A condition only partially restraining alienation is valid.[671] In the case of a partial restraint, section 10 is not attracted.[672] Conditions restraining alienation for a particular time have already been considered in note (4) above. As to prohibition of alienation to a particular class, the English cases are not consistent. In Attwater v Attwater,[673] a condition not to alienate except to particular persons was held to be bad. On the other hand, a condition not to sell out of the family was held good by Lord Ellenborough in Deo d Gill v Pearson,[674] and by MR Jessel Re Macleay.[675] Both these decisions were approved by the Privy Council in Muhammad Raza v Abbas Bandi Bibi,[676] where it was held that a condition restraining the transferee from transferring to a stranger, i.e., outside the family, was not an absolute restriction, and was valid. Cases in which a condition against alienation to a stranger have been held to be an absolute restraint[677] can no longer be regarded as good law. In the Privy Council case above referred to, their Lordships said that after the passing of the TP Act, a partial restriction upon the power of disposition would not, in the case of a transfer inter vivos, be regarded as repugnant, and that there was no authority to suggest that a different principle was applied by the courts in India before that Act. A condition in a deed of partition that if any coparcener wished to sell his share in a residential house or if his share were sold in any other way, the other coparcener would be entitled to buy it was held to be valid. An agreement of this sort is proper and is enforceable against the promisor's representatives, and is not hit by section 14.[678] Thus a restriction on alienation of property to strangers aimed at ensuring that property bequeathed did not go into hands of third party is valid and does not violate the rule of perpetuity.[679] Similarly, a condition in a deed of partition by joint owners of land that the owner of a share could only sell it to the members of the community has been held valid.[680] Where the sale-deed permitted the transferee to part with or dispose off his interest in the land to any other person but not within the period of five years, it was held that the sale-deed was not hit by section 10 or 11 of TP Act.[681]

In a case decided by Bombay High Court, the sale deed of a property included a condition that it should not be sold to anybody outside the family of the vendor. The vendee sold the property to cousins of the vendor. It was held that the first cousins very much belonged to the vendor's stock (family). There was no breach of the convenant. Even assuming that there was a breach of the convenant, it was immaterial because the condition incorporated in the sale deed is void under section 10.[682]

A condition that if the vendee sells, he shall give the vendor the option of buying back is obviously not an absolute restraint. Cases relating to such a condition have arisen with reference to the rule against perpetuity, and are considered in section 14 below. A provision in the sale deed that in the event of failure to construct a private college in the property sold there under, the property should be reconveyed by the transferee to the transferor for the same consideration would amount to an absolute restraint on alienation.[683]

A condition in a kharposh grant made by a zamindar in favour of a junior member that the subject-matter of the grant was not liable to be attached, and sold in execution does not amount to an absolute restraint, and is not void.[684] Similarly, a condition imposed by a bye-law on its members that a member cannot alienate the property to a non-Parsi person would be only a partial restraint and therefore valid and enforceable.[685]

It has been held that a clause in a lease deed, that the interest of the lease holder shall not be transferred without the written permission of the deputy commissioner did not impose a complete ban on transfer and was, therefore, not void under section 10.[686]

(6) Agreement in Restraint of Alienation

The section refers to a condition restricting the estate transferred, it has no application to an agreement affecting the transferee personally. In a case decided by Allahabad High Court,[687] the vendee executed a separate agreement that he would not transfer the property purchased to anyone except the vendor, and then at the same price. It was held that this agreement was void as it deprived the purchaser of the right of alienation. It is submitted that this is not correct unless, as in a Bombay case,[688] the agreement was by a registered instrument and part of the transaction of sale. The true rule was stated in the later Allahabad case of Devi Dayal v Ghasita.[689] In that case A sold a house to B and on the date of the sale, B executed a separate unregistered agreement that if he wished to sell the house, he would sell it back to A for the same price and would sell it to no one else, unless A declined to purchase. If this had been a condition of the sale it would have been invalid as a restraint on alienation,[690] but the court said that "this was a special personal contract between the parties which was binding on them and could be enforced against a transferee with notice". It is submitted that the effect of this decision is that an invalid condition in restraint of partition may yet operate as a personal covenant binding the covenantor personally, and creating an obligation enforcible against a transferee from him with notice under section 40. With reference to an award which contained an invalid condition against partition, the Privy Council said that it may have bound the parties who agreed amongst themselves to abide by it.[691]

(7) Restriction Against Alienation in Compromise

A compromise is not a transfer to which this section applies. A compromise operates, therefore, not as a transfer, but as an admission that the party has no right to alienate. The title so admitted may be a restricted interest which under section 6 is not transferable. This is explained in Basanowda v Irgodatti[692] where under a compromise between a widow and a reversioner, the widow was held to have a limited interest such as is referred to in section 6(d) — now section 6(dd)—which she could not alienate. Similarly, in Diwali v Apaji,[693] a case to which the TP Act did not apply, there was a compromise of a dispute between a widow and an adopted son under which an allotment of land was made for the maintenance of the widow with a provision in restraint of alienation. It was held that this land could not be attached for her debt as she had no disposing power over it. In Mata Prasad v Nageshar Sahai,[694] there was a dispute as to succession between a widow and a nephew. This was compromised on terms that the widow was to retain possession for life while the title of the nephew was admitted with a provision restraining him from alienating during the widow's lifetime. The Privy Council upheld this as a family settlement, prudent and reasonable in the circumstances of the case. Similarly, in a Calcutta case,[695] a document settling a dispute between a Hindu widow and two surviving members of the family provided that any lease given of the family property should be void, unless signed and consented to by both parties, and these provisions were held to be valid.

It has been held by the Punjab High Court, however, that where the TP Act does not apply, a condition against alienation in a compromise is void.[696]

(8) Restraint on Mode of Alienation

If, however, the restraint is on the mode of alienation, it is not restraint within the meaning of this section.[697]

(9) Restraint Against Alienation in Gift

Under section 126 of the TP Act, a gift may be made on an agreed condition that it may be revoked on the happening of an event which does not depend upon the will of the donor. However, the condition contemplated by section 126 which is in a chapter dealing with "gifts" should not be repugnant to the provisions of sections 10 & 12 which deal with all "transfers of property by act of parties". Thus, where a deed of gift provided that the donee or his successor had no right to transfer the property and that if they did transfer, the same would be invalid and the donor or his successor would have a right to revoke the gift, the condition was held to be invalid.[698] The last paragraph of the section enacts that the condition of revocation does not affect the rights of transferees for consideration without notice. This makes it clear that the condition of revocation operates only as a personal covenant. It does not restrict the interest of the donee, and is not repugnant to the gift under section 10. It has, therefore, been held that if A makes a gift of his property to B, with a condition that A should be at liberty to revoke the gift if B transferred the property without A's consent, the condition does not contravene the provisions of section 10, and is valid.[699]

(10) Partition and family arrangements

Section 10 per se does not apply to family settlements and partitions,[700] yet any total restraint on the right of alienation would be void.[701] In Malayalandiyil Kayakool Edakozhi Subair v Kayyalakkakath Kunhamina Umma,[702] the court held that even though section 10 is not applicable to the case of partition, but, the principle underlined is applicable in the case of partition also depending on the nature of the estate obtained. If the case is of absolute ownership, power of alienation must go along with it and any restraint of that power will be against the public policy and will be deemed void. Cases of restraint on partition are dealt with under section 11.

In Chamaru Sahu v Sona Koer,[703] J Mookerjee had to construe a deed of family settlement between reversionary heirs and two Hindu widows by which the reversioners were restrained from alienating during the lifetime of the widows. He considered that the restraint was void if not under section 10 then under section 11, but as the object of the restriction was to protect the rights of the widows to receive maintenance from what had been their husband's property, he held that the alienees of the reversioners who had accepted a mortgage contrary to the provisions of the deed of settlement held the property subject to the rights of maintenance possessed by the widows. It is submitted that the restrictions on the reversioners being the result of a family settlement, was valid, as in Mata Prasad's case. In Govind Waman v Murlidhar[704] the Bombay High Court held that a compromise decree which contained a term contrary to section 10 is not for that reason invalid. The decision was based on the ground that a consent decree is binding on the parties, until it is set aside.

(11) Restraint on Transferor

The section only refers to restraint on alienation by the transferee or those claiming under him. It has no bearing on cases where on a transfer a restraint is put on alienation by the transferor. This may occur where the transfer is of a partial interest as in a mortgage. In such cases, it may be a clog on the equity of redemption.[705]

(12) Exception in the Case of Lease

A lease is an exception to the rule against an absolute restraint on alienation. This exception arises from the very nature of a lease which is a transfer of property for a time, or in perpetuity, but in which the lessor necessarily retains an interest. Thus, a condition in a lease that the lessee shall not sublet or assign is valid—section 108(j) read with the words "in the absence of a contract to the contrary." It is also immaterial that the lease is a permanent lease.[706] A condition requiring the lessee to pay a fourth of the purchase money as nazar to the lessor in case he should assign the lease is valid.[707] A condition in a permanent lease, that should the necessity for alienation by the lessor arise the lessee will surrender the lease to the lessor, is valid.[708] So also a condition in a perpetual lease that the lessee's right shall be heritable, but not transferable, is not void.[709]

The words in this section "when the condition is for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him" seem to be merely explanatory of the reason for the exception. They have been construed to mean that the restriction is invalid, unless accompanied with a right of re-entry.[710] This has been dissented from in a case decided by Madras High Court[711] on the ground that every such restriction is for the benefit of the lessor; but that case also held that a restriction without a right of re-entry gives the lessor a right to damages, but was invalid as a condition and does not have the effect of rendering the assignment invalid. The amendment made in section 111(g), by Act 20 of 1929, makes it clear that the breach of a condition against alienation will not work a forfeiture, unless the condition reserves a right of re-entry. A condition that in case of alienation by the lessee, the lease shall be void is not now sufficient to determine the lease, and the case of Vyankataraya v Shivrambhat[712] is now obsolete. Unless a right of re-entry is reserved, the breach of such a condition merely gives the lessor a right to an injunction and damages.[713]

The restriction on assignment prevents the lessee from assigning without the consent of the lessor. This is frequently expressed in the lease with the added clause that such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld.

A condition in a darpatni lease that if the darpatni is sold for arrears of rent, derivative tenures created by the darpatnidar would be extinguished, is not a restraint on alienation.[714] According to the Allahabad High Court, right to transfer is not legal in case of perpetual lease.[715]

Rent-free grants under the Agra Tenancy Acts—Uttar Pradesh Act 2 of 1901 and Act 3 of 1926—do not convey the proprietary title of the grantor landlord. Such grants are like leases exempt from the rule against absolute restraint of alienation embodied in this section. A condition in a rent-free grant restraining the grantee from alienating is, therefore, valid.[716]

(13) Effect of Involuntary Alienation on Conditions Against Alienation in Leases

An involuntary alienation does not constitute a breach of a condition against alienation in a lease. An assignment by the operation of law, such as a sale in execution, or a sale of the property of a company by an official liquidator,[717] or a sale by the official assignee,[718] is not a breach of the condition. In Golak Nath v Mathura Nath,[719] the Calcutta High Court said:

> We take it to be clear law in India, as in England, that a general restriction on assignment does not apply to an assignment by operation of law taking effect in invitum as a sale under an execution.

But there may be an express prohibition of alienation in execution, and if so it will be enforced. In a Bombay case[720] where the condition was "not to let the land be sold or attached in execution," CJ Sargent said that if the lessee allowed the land to be attached and sold by not taking measures to satisfy his judgment creditor, there would be a breach both according to the letter and spirit of the provision in the lease. However, a condition in a decree on a compromise that a party shall have no power of alienation, is not broken if the property is sold in execution of a decree against the party.[721]

(14) Hindu and Mahomedan Law

The prohibition of a condition in absolute restraint on alienation enacted in this section conforms to Hindu and Mahomedan law. Under Hindu law, such a condition either in a gift inter vivos[722] or in a will,[723] is void. Thus where the person gets the property under a Will, with absolute powers to enjoy it, any condition restraining alienation would be void.[724] Even before the amending Act which makes the section directly applicable to Hindus, many cases affecting Hindus were decided with reference to this section.[725] In Mahomedan law also, a condition in restraint of alienation attached to a gift is void.[726] However, when a Mahomedan widow was restrained from alienating to a stranger as the result of a compromise, the Chief Court of Oudh applied the rule that a compromise is in no sense an alienation, and held that the restraint was valid.[727] This case was confirmed on appeal by the Privy Council,[728] and their Lordships observed that, apart from the favour with which courts regard family settlements, such a restraint was neither inconsistent with Mahomedan law, nor with section 10 of TP Act, and was permissible under English law which is applicable as a rule of justice, equity and good conscience.

(15) Married Woman

The proviso recognizes as another exception the restraint on the power of anticipation in the case of a married woman who is not a Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist. This restraint was a clause introduced in marriage settlements whereby property was settled on married women for their separate use without power to sell or charge the corpus of the estate. The English Common law rule that a woman's property became her husband's on marriage was abrogated in respect of marriage after 1 January 1866, by section 4 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865. However, in settlements designed to protect married women from themselves, this clause was retained and received statutory recognition in this section and in sections 56 and 58 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882. The Married Women's Property Act, 1874, was passed to establish the separate property of married women who were married before 1 January 1866 with reference to their own wages and earnings. Section 7 of that Act says that a married woman may sue or be sued in her own name in respect of her separate property. Section 8 provides that a person entering into a contract with a married woman with reference to her separate property may sue and recover against her to the extent of that property. The High Court of Calcutta held that these provisions enabled a creditor to enforce his claim also against property which a married woman is restrained from alienating.[729] This decision was followed by J Farran in a case of Bombay High Court[730] with great reluctance. The Madras High Court, however, held that full meaning can be given to section 8 of the Married Women's Property Act without imputing to the legislature an intention to ignore conditions in restraint of alienation distinctly recognized in a later Act.[731] Statutory effect has been given to the Madras view by the amended proviso to section 8 of the Married Women's Property Act, substituted by section 2 of the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Supplement Act, 1929. This expressly provides that decrees passed against a married woman under section 8 cannot be executed by the attachment or sale of property she is restrained from alienating during marriage.

(16) Securities and Shares

The definition of "securities" will only take in shares of a public limited company notwithstanding the use of the words "any incorporated company or other body corporate" in the definition. It is evident that for shares of a public limited company to come within the definition of securities they have to satisfy that they are marketable.[732]

Statutory Prohibitions

Transfer of property is not always impermissible but subject to conditions prescribed by Government,[733] and the statutory bar on alienation will override the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act.[734] Thus there may be a statutory restriction on transfer of land by a member of Scheduled Caste to a person other than Scheduled Caste. Such notification would not be hit by section 10.[735] However, when a right of transfer has been provided by provisions of a statute and bar contemplated does not apply to the case at hand, no clause or a condition in original patta granted by zamindar can restrict such a right of transfer.[736]

Creation of life estate:

A life estate can validly be created under a settlement. In Solomon v Edward Alexander,[737] A executed a settlement creating a life estate in favour of B and his wife and upon their death, the property was to vest absolutely in C. B's wife released her right in favour of B and B sold the total property to D. (1) Amendment

The only amendment made in this section by the amending Act 20 of 1929, is the substitution of the second paragraph for the old second paragraph.

(2) Principle

This section refers to a restriction on the enjoyment of property, while section 10 refers to a restriction on the transfer of property. Both sections rest on the same principle that a condition repugnant to the interest created is void. Where property is transferred absolutely, it must be transferred with all its legal incidents. The vendor is not competent to sever from the right of property, incidents which the law inseparably annexes to it, and to abrogate the law by a private arrangement. A condition repugnant to the interest created is void when the property is transferred absolutely.[739] A 'habendum' (the part of the deed of conveyance which defines the nature of the estate granted, beginning with the words 'to hold') cannot override section 54 (which defines 'sale'). In a deed of sale, there cannot be created a life-interest in favour of the vendee. Such a limitation would be repugnant to section 11.[740]

(3) Sections 10 and 11 Compared

Section 11 refers to absolute interest only. A restraint on transfer is repugnant to any interest in property, whether absolute or limited, for the right of transfer is an incident of ownership. A restriction on enjoyment is repugnant to an absolute interest, but may not be repugnant to a limited interest such as a lease-hold or a life-estate.[741]

(1) A makes an absolute gift of a house to B with a direction that B shall reside in it. The gift is absolute and the direction is void. B may live in the house or not as he pleases.

(2) A makes a gift of a house to B on condition that the gift will be forfeited if B does not reside in it. The condition is valid, for the gift is not an absolute gift but one subject to a condition of defeasance—section 28 or 31.

(3) A by sale conveys an absolute interest in a farm to B. The sale deed contains a direction that B shall not cut down the trees. The direction is invalid.

(4) A assigns a life interest in a farm to B for her maintenance. The deed contains a direction that B shall not cut down the trees. The direction is valid.

It has been held that the provisions of this section override section 126, and that a gift restraining enjoyment is void.[742]

Absolute interest fall under both sections 10 and 11, and the words "applied" (section 11) and "disposed" (section 10) show that the sections do to a certain extent overlap. This is well illustrated by the case of Chamaru Sahu v Soma Koer.[743] In that case a Hindu widow transferred her husband's estate to the reversionary heirs with a condition that they should not alienate it in her lifetime. The case was one under section 10, but in view of some observations of MR Jessel Re Macleay,[744] J Mookerjee doubted if the restraint was absolute within the meaning of section 10, and, therefore, decided the case under this section.[745]

Cases restricting the right of partition fall as much under the section as the other.

(4) Distinction Between section 11 and section 31

The basic distinction between these two provisions relates to:

(i) direction envisaged in section 11;

(ii) a condition envisaged in section 31;

(iii) an interest being created absolutely under section 11; and

(iv) an interest being created not qualified by the word 'absolutely'; but with a condition superadded in section 31 of TP Act.[746]

(5) Indian Succession Act

The section corresponds with section 138 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The following illustration is annexed to the section in the Indian Succession Act, 1925:

A sum of money is bequeathed towards purchasing a country residence for A, or to purchase an annuity for A, or to place A in any business. A chooses to receive the legacy in money. He is entitled to do so.

(6) Absolutely

The section does not apply, unless the transfer creates an absolute interest in the transferee. For a transferee to deal with interest in the property transferred "as if there was no such direction" regarding the particular manner of enjoyment of the property, the instrument of transfer should evidence that an absolute interest in favour of the transferee has been created. The section rests on the principle that any condition which is repugnant to the interest created is void, and when property is transferred absolutely, it must be done with all its legal incidents.[747] It does not apply for instance, to a lease which is a transfer of a limited interest, and the lessee is bound by the conditions and covenants expressed or implied in the lease restricting his mode of enjoyment. When a deed of gift gave land to the donees as "they are the descendants of the same stock as my family and there remains nothing now for their support, and the gift was expressed to be for their maintenance, a covenant restrictive of alienation was held not to be void for repugnancy, as the gift was not of an absolute interest, but of usufruct only.[748] So also, when land is granted only for use and cultivation;[749] or when a grant is made for life;[750] or a vendor reserves a subordinate interest for himself.[751] However, when an absolute estate is conveyed, any restriction on its enjoyment is invalid. Thus, when a co-sharer of a village sold his share to another sharer who executed at the same time an agreement not to collect rents, or demand partition, or alienate or encumber, or else the sale would be avoided, the court read the two documents together, and held the agreement to be repugnant to the proprietary interest conveyed by the sale deed.[752] A stipulation in a sale deed for the payment of a certain amount to the vendor out of the profits of the property by way of rent was held to be illegal.[753] In a deed of gift, properties were transferred to the son by his deceased father, on condition to provide maintenance to his dependents. Such a condition is not, in any way, repugnant to the interest created by the instrument. It is not hit by the provisions of section 11. The son was bound to maintain his stepmother, under the express terms of the deed of gift.[754] Where the property was sold absolutely to B by a registered sale deed but the deed mentioned that the purchaser would not be entitled to have a pukka construction in front of the shop or construct a basement, the restrictions would amount to a restraint within the meaning of section 11 and would be void.[755]

Once an absolute interest is created in favour of a person, no restriction can be placed as to the manner in which such interest is to be enjoyed. Where under a partition deed each coparcener received the property as a full owner thereof, but a condition was incorporated in it preventing a coparcener from alienating his share, it was held that such clause in the partition deed restricting the right of the coparcener over his share would be void and the coparcener can execute a will of the share, bequeath his share and confer a valid title on the legatee.[756]

(7) Partition

A right to partition is an incident of joint ownership of property. In Umrao Singh v Baldeo Singh,[757] a testator left his property to his sons jointly with a direction that the property should not be partitioned till all the sons attain majority. The Lahore High Court held that this was an invalid restriction on the right of enjoyment even though it was for a limited time. An agreement not to partition, though it may be binding on the immediate parties, will not bind their successors in interest.[758] The Bombay High Court has held that such an agreement is inconsistent with the Hindu law, and will not bind even the parties themselves;[759] and the Allahabad High Court has held that even an immediate party is not bound by an agreement not to partition for an indefinite time.[760]

ILLUSTRATION

An arbitrator made an award between two sisters giving each a half share of an estate and appointing the husband of one sister manager, but directed that neither sister would have a right to claim partition. One sister died and her son sued for partition. The Privy Council held that the clause in restraint of partition afforded no defence to the son's suit for partition. Their Lordship said:

> It may have bound the parties who agreed among themselves to abide by it; but as against the present plaintiff, the clause has no effect whatever ... (The arbitrator) had no power to make property which was divisible by law indivisible forever.[761]

On the other hand, an estate may be impartible by custom, or by the terms of the grant, for the Crown has power to grant or transfer land and by its grant or transfer, to limit in any way it pleases the descent of such lands.[762]

(8) Hindu and Mahomedan Law

The invalidity of conditions in restraint of enjoyment of property is recognized both in Hindu and Mahomedan Law. A direction in restraint of partition in a Hindu will;[763] or in a Hindu gift[764] is void. In Anantha v Nagamuthu[765] it was decided under Hindu law that a condition in a gift to Brahmins restrictive of alienation is invalid as being repugnant to the nature of grant; and the same decision was given in Rukminilal v Laxmibai[766] under this section. An estate cannot be made subject to a condition which is repugnant to any of its ordinary legal incidents, and there is nothing in the Hindu law which would permit of a departure from that principle.[767] Under Mahomedan law when a gift is made subject to a condition which derogates from its completeness, the gift is valid, but the condition is void.[768]

(9) Restrictions for Beneficial Enjoyment of One's Own Land

This section relates to the enforcement of the restrictions against the transferee, while section 40 refers to the enforcements of the restriction against purchasers from the transferee.

The words "compel the enjoyment", which occurred in the old section, have been omitted in the section as amended. The omission of those words, however, does not effect any change in the law, for though words have been omitted, the substituted words "to enforce such direction" have the same effect. In other words, the section as amended recognizes as much as did the old section that there may be a covenant which, though affirmative in character, may be enforceable as between the actual parties to the transfer, i.e., the transferor and transferee. Where upon the sale of the property, a portion of the property was retained by the seller and the imposition of a restriction was necessary in order the vendor could enjoy his property, such restriction or condition would be valid and enforceable. However, if the seller fails to demonstrate that the condition imposed in the sale deed was made for the purpose of securing the beneficial enjoyment of his another property the condition would amount to a restriction repugnant to the interest created and thus void.[769] In Bhupati Bhushan v Birendra Mohan[770] it was held that a condition in a deed by which a vendee agrees to pay an annuity to B for life, and thereafter to the vendor, his heirs and successors forever out of a specific property, such a condition though not a covenant recurring with the land is a perpetual charge binding on the vendee and his heirs. Respondent-transferee is bound by the covenant in the sale deed mentioning the existence of a decree of permanent injunction against the vendors, in the enjoyment of the property purchased by him.[771]

In Umashankar Agarwal v Daulatram Sahu,[772] a shop was sold subject to a condition that purchaser shall not be entitled to construct any basement or any pakka construction but there was nothing to show that this direction was made for the purpose of securing the beneficial enjoyment of vendor's another property. The condition stipulated was held contrary to the mandate of section 11 and hence void.

(10) Position under section 40

Paragraph 1 of section 40 before its amendment, also contained the words "compel its enjoyment," which recognized that an affirmative covenant may be enforced even against a purchaser from a transferee. However, those words have now been omitted in that section, and the legislature has adopted the view that an affirmative covenant cannot now be enforced against a purchaser from a transferee. It is only a negative covenant that may be enforced against him, eg a covenant not to build. If there is such a covenant, and the purchaser buys with notice of the covenant, the court may restrain him by an injunction from building. There is no substitution in section 40 of the words "enforce such direction" for the words "compel the enjoyment" as in section 11. A restrictive covenant imposed for the better enjoyment of property cannot be enforced against the covenantor by a stranger, unless such a right can be specifically transferred to him.[773]

The result then is that there is no alteration in the law in section 11. The alteration is in section 40 to the extent mentioned above. In Nand Gopal v Batuck Prasad[774] a covenant to pull down, when required by the vendor, the rooms over a passage between the house of the vendor and the house sold, was held to fall under the second paragraph of section 11, and to be enforceable under section 40 against a transferee from the vendee. The case was decided under the law as it was before the amendment of the two sections. Under the amended sections, the covenant could have been enforced against the vendee under section 11, but being an affirmative covenant it could not have been enforced against a transferee from the vendee.

In determining whether a covenant is negative or positive, the court looks to the substance, and not to the form of expression.[775] Thus absence of negative words cannot by itself always indicate that the covenant is of a positive character. Thus covenant to leave a space having the width of 12 fingers to the respective side's from a common wall in case of future reconstruction of respective portions of building though positive in form is negative in its essence and character.[776]

(11) Enforceable Against Whom

A single Judge of the Allahabad High Court has held that the second part of section 11 can be enforced only by the transferor, and not by a transferee of another portion of the property. This is so even though all the transfers have similar conditions imposed, and all were concluded on the same day and the conditions are imposed for the beneficial enjoyment of the portions transferred to such other transferees. A contract binds only the parties thereto. Section 40 also does not apply as it is confined to land burdened with restrictive covenants.[777]

In Santhakumaran v Vivekanandan,[778] the parents of two sons, S_1 and S_2 assigned a part of property in the north of the property owned by them and rice mill therein to S_2. Since they retained a portion of the property with them, the assignment imposed a few covenants on S_2, to prevent the possible nuisance on account of the functioning of the rice mill. By virtue of the covenants, S_2, among others, was to construct a compound wall at a height of 8 feet separating the properties given to him and retained by the parents; to keep a gate opening to the property in dispute for entry to the rice mill on the compound wall directed to be constructed; to construct a compound wall on the western boundary of the property and to maintain the gate at the southern boundary of the property for the use of S_2 as also the parents by keeping one of its key with him and giving one key to the parents. Later, S_1 purchased the residential property retained by the parents. After the parents' death, both the parties obtained rights in the remaining one half of the property in dispute. Thereafter, S_2 demolished the compound wall on the western boundary and the gate installed on the southern boundary of the property. The issue was whether a transferee of the covenantee is entitled to enforce the covenants imposed for the beneficial enjoyment of the property acquired by him. The court held that the second part of section 11 saves the restrictions made for the purpose of securing the beneficial enjoyment of the remaining property of the transferor and when the benefit has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land, it passes by assignment of that land and said to run with it. Further, the benefit annexed to the land is available even to an assignee who is not aware of the benefit at the time of assignment. Therefore S_2 had to abide by the covenants.

12. Condition making interest determinable on insolvency or attempted alienation.—Where property is transferred subject to a condition or limitation making any interest therein, reserved or given to or for the benefit of any person, to cease on his becoming insolvent or endeavouring to transfer or dispose off the same, such condition or limitation is void.

Nothing in this section applies to a condition in a lease for the benefit of the lessor or those claiming under him.

(1) Forfeiture on Insolvency

The object of the section is to protect the creditors of the transferee who would otherwise be prevented from having recourse to the property transferred for the satisfaction of their debts. Despite a condition of defeasance on insolvency, the property would vest in the official receiver or the official assignee, as the case may be. The words "dispose off" no doubt refer to settlements, for it would be a fraud on creditors if a man was permitted to settle his property in trust for himself until he should take advantage of the Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, and after that on a near relation.

ILLUSTRATION

A settles property in trust for himself until his death or bankruptcy and then over, on either of these events, on his wife. A is adjudged insolvent. A's life interest vests in the Official Receiver or Official Assignee.

(2) Forfeiture on Attempted Alienation

In so far as the section invalidates a condition of defeasance on an attempted alienation, it rests on the same principles as sections 10 and 11 as to restrictions repugnant to the interest transferred.

Provident Fund

A rule of Provident Fund that a member purporting to transfer or assign his share or interest in the fund should forfeit such share or interest was held to be invalid under this section. The member applied to be declared insolvent. The Calcutta High Court held that though the vesting in the official assignee, which was the effect of the application, was a transfer by operation of law, yet the member's application to be declared insolvent was a voluntary transfer under the rule. However, as the rule was invalid there was no forfeiture to the fund, but the interest did not vest in the official assignee for the benefit of the creditors.[779]

Stock Broker's card

The section has no application to a rule of Stock Brokers' Association forfeiting a defaulting member's card of membership.[780]

(3) Indian Succession Act, 1925

In this matter, the provisions of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 differ, for a bequest may be made subject to a condition of defeasance in the event of insolvency. Illustration (vii) to section 120 of that Act which is corresponding to illustration (g) to section 107, Indian Succession Act, 1865 are relevant in this respect.[781]

(4) Lease

Leases constitute an exception, for the lessor having the jus dis-ponendi may annex any conditions he pleases to his grant, provided they be not illegal or unreasonable.[782] A covenant determining a lease in the event of the insolvency of the lessee is valid.[783] The condition applies to the insolvency of the person who has the term created by the lease. If the lessee assigns the term and then becomes insolvent, the condition does not apply.[784] The insolvency of the lessee will not involve a forfeiture, unless there is a provision in the lease that the lessor may re-enter on the happening of such event. This is expressly enacted in the amendment made in section 111 (g) by the amending Act 20 of 1929. The new section 114A provides for relief of forfeiture in such cases.

A kharposh grant of certain property made by the holder of an impartible property in favour of junior for maintenance, is not a lease. A condition in such grant that if the said property is sold in auction for the grantee's debt the grant will come to an end, is not an absolute restraint on alienation and is not invalid under section 10, but is wholly void under section 12.[785]

(5) For the Benefit of the Lessor

The amendment of section 111(g) makes it clear that these words refer to a condition giving the lessor a right of re-entry.

13. Transfer for benefit of unborn person.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a person not in existence at the date of the transfer, subject to a prior interest created by the same transfer, the interest created for the benefit of such person shall not take effect, unless it extends to the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property.

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers property of which he is the owner to B in trust for A and his intended wife successively for their lives, and after the death of the survivor, for the eldest son of the intended marriage for life, and after his death for A's second son. The interest so created for the benefit of the eldest son does not take effect, because it does not extend to the whole of A's remaining interest in the property.

(1) Transfer for Benefit of Unborn Person

A transfer cannot be made directly to an unborn person, for the definition of transfer in section 5 is limited to living persons. Such a transfer can only be made by the machinery of trusts. A trust may thus be created in favour of an unborn person if it satisfies the condition laid down in section 13 even though coming into existence of such a person is uncertain.[786] Possibly it is intended to express this distinction by the words "for the benefit of," the trustees being the transferees who hold the property for the benefit of the unborn person.

Under Hindu[787] law, a child en ventre sa mere is in existence. In a case of Andhra Pradesh High Court, M executed a settlement deed in respect of the suit property, giving a life estate to his son G and, after G's death, to the sons of G, to be born, absolutely. G, in turn, executed a "relinquishment" deed of his estate in favour of his father. It was held that merely because the relinquishment deed was executed before the birth of the sons of G, the gift in favour of the unborn sons would not fail. The invalidity of the transfer must be judged with reference to the original settlement deed, and not by the voluntary act of the donees under the deed itself. A person who obtains the benefit of a deed cannot, by his volition, defeat the terms of the deed under which he obtained the interest. The unborn acquired a vested interest on his birth under section 20. No one can defeat such interest. The life estate holder cannot defeat the interests of the unborn person by transferring the life estate to a third person. In this case, there was no possibility of defeating the interests of the unborn children as violative of the provisions of section 16.[788] Where A transfers the property in favour of B with his other siblings not in existence on the date of the transfer, the transfer in favour of unborn persons is valid and B would have to share the property with them.[789]

(2) Subject to a Prior Interest

The estate must vest in some person between the date of the transfer, and the coming into existence of the unborn person. The interest of the unborn person must, therefore, be in every case preceded by a prior interest; and the section in effect says that the interest of the unborn person must be the whole remainder, so that it is impossible to confer an estate for life on an unborn person. In the illustration to the section, the interest created for the benefit of the unborn eldest son is only a life interest and it, therefore, fails. A transfer in favour of an unborn person is therefore valid, provided it is effected through a living person.[790] Where property was gifted by the owner to his grandson without any power of alienation and after the death of such grandson, the property was to vest in his male children absolutely, such gift would be valid, and the condition restraining alienation by the grandson is valid and therefore alienation by him during his life would be void.[791] Where the property was transferred by the transferor by way of gift deed in favour of the grandson without any power of alienation and the property thereafter was to vest in male children of the grandson, such gift created a life interest in favour of the grandson and absolute interest in favour of his unborn sons, and would be valid under this section. Restraint on powers of alienation of the grandson would be valid and alienation at his behest would be improper. His sons would be entitled to sale consideration received by the father upon such sale.[792] In R Sakunthala v P Renganathan,[793] a testator created a life interest for his sons without right of alienation and after their life time it was to devolve upon their male descendants for life and thereafter their descendants for generations. The recital, it was held fell under the mischieve of both section 13 and the rule against perpetuity, which is against public policy hence, the later part of the Will would have no effect. Where through a settlement deed a large portion of property was settled absolutely in favour of the other while a portion of property by way of life interest was retained by himself and his descendants, an absolute settlement made with respect to the retained property later would be void.[794] In Girish Dutt v Data Din,[795] A made a gift of her property to B, her nephew's daughter, for life, and then to B's male descendants, if she should have any, absolutely; but if she should have no male descendants then to B's daughter without power of alienation; but if there were no descendants of B, male or female, then to her nephew. B died without issue. The gift to the unborn daughters, being of a limited interest and subject to the prior interest created in favour of B, was invalid under section 13 and the gift to the nephew, therefore, failed under section 16. The illustration to section 113 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, may also be referred to in this connection.

The section is almost identical with section 113, Indian Succession Act, 1925. The difference between the two sections is that the former relates to transfer inter vivos, while the latter deals with bequest which take effect only on the death of the testator. The principle underlined in section 113 is that a person disposing of property to another shall not fetter the free disposition of that property in the hands of several generations. The rule is quite distant from rule against perpetuity, though their effects sometimes overlap.

Section 13 controls section 113 and, therefore, both these sections should be read together.[796]

An instance of a bequest held invalid under this section is the case of Putlibai v Sorabji Naoroji.[797]

In Sopher v Administrator-General of Bengal.[798] The Privy Council, considered the effect of section 113 of the Indian Succession Act in a will which provided for an ultimate bequest in favour of persons not born at the time of the testator's death, and the question that arose for decision was whether the bequest comprised the whole of the testator's remaining interest in the thing bequeathed. Two clauses in the will provided for the forfeiture of the interests of the unborn beneficiaries in certain contingencies. It was held that:

> if under a bequest in the circumstances mentioned in section 113 there is a possibility of the interest given to a beneficiary being defeated either by a contingency or by a clause of defeasance, the beneficiary under the later bequest does not receive the interest bequeathed in the same unfettered form as that in which the testator held it and that the bequest to him does not therefore comprise the whole of the remaining interest of the testator in the thing bequeathed.

This decision was considered by Blagden J in Ardeshir v Dadabhoy,[799] a case where a settlement provided for a gift to the settlor's grandsons who were not yet born and which provided that if the settlor's sons pre-deceased the senior without male issue, the property was to revert to the settlor. The settlement also reserved a power of revocation in the settlor. The learned judge observed:

> it does seem unfortunate that their Lordships' attention was apparently focussed entirely on section 113 and 120 of the Indian Succession Act and does not seem ever to have been called to illustration 3 to section 114...

In view of the decision in Sopher's case, questions would arise as to the validity of such settlements in which the settlor reserves a power of revocation or variation or in which the settlor provides for the management of the interests of the unborn persons after their birth and during their minority.

Both these decisions were considered by the Bombay High Court in Framroz Dadabhoy Madon v Tehmina.[800] The court held that the principle of Sopher's case was inapplicable to trusts of a settlement inter vivos.[801] The court construed the word "extends to the whole of the remaining interest of the transferor in the property" as directed to the extent of the subject-matter and to the absolute nature of the estate conferred, and not to the certainty of its vesting.[802] This decision has been subsequently followed by the same high court.[803]

The Bombay legislature has, however, passed the Disposition of Property (Bombay Validating) Act, 1947, by which it is provided that trusts or wills made prior to 1 January 1947, would not be deemed to be invalid by reason of section 13 of the TP Act or section 113 of the Indian Succession Act, i.e., by the construction put on those provisions by the Privy Council in Sopher's case.

(4) Movables

As its position in the TP Act shows, the section applies to movable as well as immovable property.[804]

(5) Hindu Law

According to pure Hindu law, a gift or bequest in favour of an unborn person is void.[805] However, this rule has been modified by statute. The Madras Act 1 of 1914, Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 15 of 1916, and Act 8 of 1921 validate gifts to unborn persons. These Acts have been amended by sections 11, 12 and 13 of Act 21 of 1929, and the amendments enact that subject to the limitations in chapter II of TP Act, and in sections 113, 114, 115 and 116 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, no transfer inter vivos or by will of property by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not born at the date of such dispositions. The omission of the word Hindu in section 2 makes this section directly applicable to Hindus.[806]

(6) Mahomedan Law

A gift to a person not in existence is void under Mahomedan law.[807]

(1) Principle

The rule against perpetuity is founded on the general principle of policy guiding judges, that the liberty of alienation shall not be exercised to its own destruction, and that all contrivances shall be void which tend to create a perpetuity or place property forever beyond the reach of the exercise of power of alienation.[808]

(2) "Perpetuity"

A perpetuity, in the primary sense of the word, is a disposition which makes property inalienable for an indefinite period.[809] In this sense it is concerned with certain interests created in praesenti, which are sought to be made inalienable for an indefinite period. In its modern sense, it is concerned with interest arising in futuro, and not with interest arising in praesenti. The present section, strictly speaking, deals only with the modern rule against perpetuities. In this sense TP Act appears to be incomplete.

(3) Rule as perpetuity in its primary sense

Examples of such interest in praesenti which have been held void under the name of perpetuity or as tending to a perpetuity are, as conveniently classified in Halsbury's Laws of England[810] as follows:

> (1) Estates and interests limited in praesenti with an unauthorised mode of devolution, for example an estate of inheritance not known to the common law; an unbarrable entail; an estate in which successive heirs take life estates only; the attempted entail of a chattel made prior to 1926.
> (2) Interests held on perpetual non-charitable trust, where no person or persons can take any benefit, eg trusts to keep in repair a tomb not part of the fabric of a church.
> (3) Gifts to trustees for non-charitable indefinite objects or for non-charitable unincorporated institutions or societies which may last for an indefinite time.

809. Jarman on Wills, 8th Edn, vol I, p 284.
810. Halsbury's Laws of England 3rd Edn, vol 29, p 278.

As regards the first class, it will suffice to say that even under the Hindu law no estate can be created which is unknown to Hindu law. The principle on which the second class is put has been applied in India in Administrator General v Hushes.[811] The cases falling within the third class require consideration.

Their Lordships of the Privy Council in an appeal from Australia[812] cited with approval the following passage from an unreported judgment of Lord Hanworth:

> The problem may be stated in this way. If the gift is in truth to the present member of the society described by their society name so that they have the beneficial use of the property and can, if they please, alienate and put the proceeds in their own pocket, then there is a present gift to individuals which is good, but if the gift is intended for the goods not only of the present but of future members so that the present members are in the position of trustees and have no right to appropriate the property or its proceeds for their personal benefit, then the gift is invalid.[813]

An Indian decision on the point is to be found in MAE Halfhyde v CA Saldanha.[814] On the authorities, it seems that the question of validity or otherwise of such a gift has to be approached by stages. The first question is: whether it is a gift to the individual members for the time being constituting the association, or is it a gift to the association. If it is the former, the gift is good. If it is a gift to the association as such, the next question is: whether it is a gift, free and unfettered, or is it a trust. If it is an unfettered gift, the gift is good. If it is a trust, the final question arises: whether it is an endowment so that the donee must hold the corpus for all times to come and cannot deal with the corpus as and when he pleases, or it is an immediate beneficial gift so that the donee can use the corpus and income as and when the donee pleases.[815] If it is an endowment, the gift fails as offending the rule against perpetuities in its primary sense and if not, it is good and valid.

Our section does not in terms deal with "perpetuity" in its primary sense, and therefore, a perpetual gift in praesenti whether free or fettered, will not strictly be within the mischief of section 14. Where husband and wife intend to have a benefit of the property for their life and vested remainder to their unborn children, there is nothing illegal in giving the vested remainder to their unborn children, and creating life interest in themselves. This life interest created in favour of the wife can be enjoyed by her along with her husband, and on his demise for her residue period. This would be an interest created in them to appropriate in praesenti its uses for their own benefit. The life estate so created in favour of the wife does not offend the rule of perpetuity as incorporated in section 14.[816]

(4) Modern rule against perpetuities

The modern rule against perpetuities is thus enunciated by Jarman:[817]

> Subject to the exceptions to be presently mentioned, no contingent or executory interest in property can be validly created, unless it must necessarily vest within the maximum period of one or more lives in being and twenty-one years[818] afterwards.

817. Jarman on Wills, 8th Edn, vol I, p 304.

The exceptions to the rule are conveniently set out in Halsbury's Laws of England.[819] It is this modern English rule which is with certain modifications, adopted by this section. The only exception to the rule expressly recognised by TP Act is that embodied in section 18. It will be presently seen that some of the exceptions recognized by the English law have also been recognized by courts in India.

So long as the transferees are living persons, any number of successive estates can be created. A transfer may be made to A for life, and then to B for life, and then to C for life, and so on, provided A, B and C are all living persons at the date of the transfer. However, if the ultimate beneficiary is some one not in existence at the date of the transfer, section 13 requires that the whole residue of the estate should be transferred to him. If he is not born before the termination of the last prior estate, the transfer to him fails under this section. If he is born before the termination of the last prior estate, he takes a vested interest at birth and possession immediately on the last prior estate.

The rule against perpetuities, however, does not require that the vesting shall take place at the birth of the ultimate beneficiary. What it does require is that the vesting cannot be delayed in any case beyond his minority. Thus, if after the life estates to A, B and C, the ultimate beneficiary is the eldest son of C, the limitation would be to C for life with remainder to C's eldest son, in which case the eldest son would take a vested interest at birth, although he may not have been born at the date of the transfer. However, if it is intended that the estate shall not vest in an infant, the limitation would be to C for life and then on trust for such son of C as shall first attain the age of 18; the son of C has then a contingent interest which becomes vested when he attains the age of 18. If the last limitation had been to C for life, and then on trust for such son of C as shall first attain the age of 19, the transfer after C's death would be void. The result of the rule against perpetuity is that the minority of the ultimate beneficiary is the latest period at which an estate can be made to vest.

(5) Regard Must be Possible and not Actual Events

In deciding questions of remoteness, regard must be possible, and not to actual events.[820] This is made quite clear in the corresponding section 114 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, where the words are "may be delayed".

R has a share in a village which he sold to the defendant reserving two bighas of land under the following condition: "Two bighas of land which I have excluded from the sale shall remain in my possession for life, and after my death in the possession of my lineal descendants...I and my lineal descendants have no right to transfer the land excluded...If none of my lineal descendants be alive then the land shall be the own property of the vendee." This was a transfer to take effect on the death of the vendor's last lineal descendant. R had only one son who was alive at the date of the transfer, but who died childless. In the case of special powers of appointment, regard should be had to the facts which are ascertained when the power is exercised.[822]

ILLUSTRATION

A testator died in 1872 leaving his property to his wife for life. He also gave his wife power to appoint on trust for their son and his issue in such manner, as she though fit. The wife died in 1893 leaving a will whereby she appointed the property to her son for life with remainder to such of his children living at her death as shall attain the age of 25. All the son's children attained the age of 25 before the wife died, i.e. before 1893. The appointment was held to be valid.[823]

(6) Indian Succession Act

The rule against perpetuity is in section 114 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The following are the illustrations to that section:

(i) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life and after his death to B for his life; and after B's death to such of the sons of B as shall first attain the age of 25. A and B survive the testator. Here the son of B who shall first attain the age of 25 may be a son born after the death of the testator; such son may not attain 25 until more then 18 years have elapsed from the death of the longer liver of A and B; and the vesting of the fund may thus be delayed beyond the lifetime of A and B and the minority of the sons of B. The bequest after B's death is void.

(ii) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life, and after his death to B for his life, and after B's death to such of B's sons as shall first attain the age of 25. B dies in the lifetime of the testator, leaving one or more sons. In this case the sons of B are persons living at the time of the testator's decease, and the time when either of them will attain 25, necessarily falls within his own lifetime. The bequest is valid.

(iii) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life, and after his death to B for his life, with a direction that after B's death it shall be divided among such of B's children as shall attain the age of 18, but that, if no child of B shall attain that age, the fund shall go to C. Here the time for the division of the fund must arrive at the latest at the expiration of 18 years from the death of B, a person living at the testator's decease. All the bequests are valid.

(iv) A fund is bequeathed to trustees for the benefit of the testator's daughters, with a direction that, if any of them marry under age, her share of the fund shall be settled so as to devolve after her death upon such of her children as shall attain the age of 18. Any daughter of the testator to whom the direction applies must be in existence at his decease, and any portion of the fund which may eventually be settled as directed must vest not later than 18 years from the death of the daughters whose share it was. All these provisions are valid.

In Anandrao Vinayak v Administrator-General of Bombay[824] there was a gift of movable property to a son with a gift of shares in the property to the son's sons when they should attain the age of 21. The gift was held void as offending against perpetuity. Similarly in Kashinath v Chimnaji[825] a bequest to a son who might at any time be adopted by the life tenant was held to be invalid on the same ground. A disposition by the testatrix providing that the sons were to remain in possession of the properties and thereafter their sons without any power of alienation and further that the great grandsons will get the properties as absolute owners, was held to be not hit by the rule against perpetuity on the ground that the sons of the testatrix and their respective sons were alive.[826]

(7) Minority

Minority in India terminates at the end of 18 years. In a Privy Council case,[827] the bequest was to the testator's daughters for their lives with remainder to their children at the age of 21. The bequest to the children was held to be void under sections 114 and 115 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. An attempt, however, was made to support the bequest on the ground that if guardians of the children were appointed by the court under the Indian Majority Act, 1875, they would not under that Act attain majority till the age of 21, but the contention failed because at the testator's death, it was not certain that any of the children would have guardians appointed.

(8) Hindu Law

Since the amendment of section 2 this section applied directly to Hindus. It was applied by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 1916, and similar provisions were contained in the Madras Act I of 1914 and in Act 8 of 1921. The amendment made to those Acts by Act 21 of 1929 make transfers by Hindus to unborn persons subject to the limitations contained in chapter II of TP Act, and bequests by Hindus to unborn persons subject to the rules contained in sections 113, 114, 115 and 116 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. However, irrespective of the statute, a perpetuity is repugnant to Hindu law except in the case of religious and charitable endowments.[828] A disposition of shebaitship by creating successive life interests is invalid.[829]

(9) Mahomedan Law

With reference to Mahomedan law, the Privy Council held in Abul Fata Mahomed v Rasamaya[830] that a gift to remote and unborn generations is forbidden by Mahomedan law except in the case of a wakf, and that a wakf is invalid if the gift is illusory. However, the law has since been altered by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, under which a wakf is valid even if the gift to charity is unsubstantial and illusory, provided there is an ultimate gift to charity. To this Act retrospective effect has been given by Act 32 of 1930.

In another case a Walf-Alal-aulad was created by a Muslim. The settlor executed a trust, settling properties for the benefit for the family, children or descendents from generation to generation, and thereafter for the maintenance of a holy shrine. It was held that the wakif-settlor made a dedication in perpetuity of the subject-matter of these trusts for purposes which are considered pious under Islamic law. The properties, therefore, ceased to be the properties for the settlor on the creation of the wakfs in 1953. It was further held that when the settlor died in 1967, the property could not form part of his estate as the settlor had divested himself of these properties 14 years prior to his death.[831]

(10) Movable and Immovable Property

The rule against perpetuity applies to movable as well as to immovable property.[832] This is indicated by the position of the section in this chapter.

(11) Charities

The rule against perpetuity does not apply to charities.[833]

(12) Power of Appointment

A general power of appointment does not tie up land, and, therefore, the period for the application of this section does not begin to run until the date of the exercise of the power.[834] Under special powers of appointment, the donee can transfer only to specified persons, and the effect, therefore, of such a power is to tie up land. In the case of a special power the period is to be reckoned from the date of creation of the power.[835] In ordinary cases, as already noted in note (5), in applying the section, regard should be had to possible and not actual events, but in the case of special powers, the facts to be regarded are ascertained when the power is exercised.[836]

In Re Legh's Settlement Trusts[837] by a deed of arrangement and re-settlement dated 2 October 1891, the trustees were amongst other things, directed to hold the residue of the trust funds and the income thereof upon trust to pay the income thereof to A during his life and after his death to hold the capital and income in trust for all or any one or more of the issues of A whether children or remote issue as A should by deed or by will appoint. A had five children including one daughter D, who predeceased A leaving two children B and C who were born respectively on 13 March 1929 and 12 May 1931. A, died on 5 March 1935, having made his will dated 3 March 1933. By that will A amongst other things, made an appointment of a share to B and C for their joint lives and after the death of either of them to the survivor for life. It will be noted that—

(1) the power of appointment given to A was a special power;

(2) that the appointees were persons not in being at the date of the deed of arrangement;

(3) at the date of the death of A when his will took effect the appointees were in being.

In these circumstances, the appointment in so far as it was to B and C, for their joint lives was quite good for the vesting of that interest must take place immediately upon the death of A and, therefore, could not be delayed beyond a life in being at the date of the deed (i.e. the life of A) and 21 years thereafter. The question was: whether the appointment in so far as it was to the survivor of them for life was hit by the rule against perpetuities. That depended on whether that appointment was a vested, or a contingent one. It was held that it was contingent, for there was no knowing as to who would be the survivor. It was quite possible that both of them might live for more than 21 years after the death of A (the life in being at the date of the deed) and, therefore, the vesting of the life estate to the survivor might be delayed beyond the life in being at the date of the deed and 21 years. In the premises it was held that the reversionary life interest of the survivor being a contingent interest, offended against the rule.

(13) Provisions for Payment of Debts of Settlor

This is dealt with in section 17(2), and in the note "Exception (i)—Payment of debts".

(14) Agreement and Rule Against Perpetuities

The rule against perpetuity does not apply to personal agreements,[838] i.e., agreements which do not create an interest in the property.

ILLUSTRATION

The shebaits of a temple agree to appoint the family of C as pujaris from generation to generation to perform the services of the temple and make provision for the expenses and remuneration of the office. The agreement is valid and not affected by the rule against perpetuity.[839]

A condition in a mortgage that the mortgagor may redeem whenever he likes, refers only to the exercise of the equity of redemption which is a present interest. It is, therefore, outside the scope of the rule against perpetuity.[840]

Agreement to purchase land: Covenants for Pre-emption

Section 54 enacts that an agreement for the sale of land does not, of itself, create an interest in land. There was a considerable conflict of decisions as to the application of the rule against perpetuity to such agreements. This conflict has been resolved by the Supreme Court in Ramharan v Tarn Mohit[841] where it held that a mere contract for sale of immovable property does not create any interest in immovable property; it follows that the rule cannot apply to such contracts, eg a covenant of pre-emption.

Infact, section 14 begins with the words "No transfer of a property can operate ..." and does not, therefore, apply where there is no "transfer" of property, but only a contract which creates no interest in the land.[842]

In Maharaj Bahadur Singh v Balchand,[843] the Privy Council construing an agreement made before the TP Act, held that a covenant of pre-emption created an equitable interest in land, and is hit by the rule. This decision was later overruled by the Supreme Court in Ram Baran v Ram Mohit.[844]

Similarly, an agreement by a permanent lessee to surrender the lease whenever the land should be required by the landlord is a personal agreement not void for remoteness.[845] An agreement in a lease granting a perpetual option to renew from time to time is not hit by the rule as it does not create an interest in property.[846]

(15) Charge and rule against perpetuities

A charge does not amount to transfer of an interest in land and is, therefore, not affected by the rule against perpetuities.[847] However, if there is no charge on land, a trust for the payment of income to a payee and his descendants from generation to generation is void as offending against the rule of perpetuity.[848]

(16) Mortgage and rule against perpetuities

In Padmanabha v Sitarama[849] it was held that the rule against perpetuities applied only to cases where there was a new interest in immovable property contemplated to be created after the expiry of the time prescribed by the rule, namely the lifetime of a person living and the minority of one who might be in existence then and that in the case of a mortgage, there was no such future interest in property contemplated to be created because it was of the very essence of the mortgage that the equity of redemption was a present interest in the property in exercise of which alone the property was sought to be redeemed. In a case,[850] by a mortgage deed of 1931, the mortgagor covenanted to repay the mortgage money with interest by 80 half-yearly instalments and also demised the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee for 3000 years with the usual proviso for cesser on repayment of the mortgage money with costs and interests. The mortgagors being desirous of redeeming the mortgage brought an action for a declaration that the mortgagor was so entitled. It was contended on behalf of the mortgagor, amongst other things, that the mortgage which fixed the date of redemption so many years ahead offended the rule against perpetuities. The House of Lords in agreement with both the courts below on this point, held that the rule against perpetuities had no application to mortgages.

Transfer to class, some of whom come under sections 13 and 14.—If, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a class of persons with regard to some of whom such interest fails by reason of any of the rules contained in sections 13 and 14, such interest fails [851][in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class.]

(1) Amendment

Before the amending Act 20 of 1929, the section was as follows:

> If, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a class of persons with regard to some of whom such interest fails by reason of any of the rules contained in sections 13 and 14, such interest fails as regards the whole class.

851. Subs. by Act 20 of 1929, sec. 9, for "as regards the whole class".

Thus, in Raj Bajrang Bahadur Singh v Thakurain Bakhtaraj Kuer,[852] the Supreme Court held that it was true that no interest could be created in favour of an unborn person, but when the gift was made to a class or a series of persons, some of whom were in existence and some were not, it did not fail in its entirety; it was valid with regard to those persons who were in existence at the time of the testator's death, and was invalid as to the rest.

(2) Indian Succession Act

The present section of the Act corresponds to section 115 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The first two illustrations to that section are as follows:

ILLUSTRATIONS

(i) A fund is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to all his children who shall attain the age of 25. The gift to A's children is a gift to a class. A survives the testator, and has some children living at the testator's death. Each child of A's living at the testator's death must attain the age of 25 (if at all) within the limits allowed for a bequest. But A may have children after the testator's decease, some of whom may not attain the age of 25 until more than 18 years have elapsed after the decease of A. The bequest to A's children, therefore, is inoperative as to any child born after the testator's death and in regard to those who do not attain the age of 25 within 18 years after A's death, but is operative in regard to the other children of A.

(ii) A fund is bequeathed to A for his life, and after his death to B, C, D, and all other children of A who shall attain the age of 25. B, C, and D are children of A living at the testator's decease. In all other respects the case is the same as that supposed in illustration (i). Although the mention of B, C and D does not prevent the bequest from being regarded as a bequest to a class, it is not wholly void. It is operative as regards any of the children B, C, or D, who attains the age of 25 within 18 years after A's death.

This section applies only in a case in which the whole class is intended to be benefited. It does not apply where there is no benefit to a class.[853]

(3) Hindu Law as to Gift to a Class

Prior to the Acts of 1914, 1916 and 1921, relating to gifts and bequests to unborn persons (section 13), a gift to a person who was not in existence at the date of the gift was void; and so was a bequest to a person who was not in existence at the date of the testator's death. This proceeded on the principle that a person who was not in existence at the material date was incapacitated from taking the bequest. Thus, if a gift was made by a Hindu to his grandsons and none of them was in existence at the date of the gift, none of them had the capacity to take, and the gift was, therefore, void. However, what if a gift was made by a Hindu to his grandson section who was in existence at the date of the gift, and to other grandsons (brothers of S) who might be born after the date of the gift, and some grandsons are born in fact after the date of the gift? It is obvious that the grandsons who were born after the date of the gift could not take; but could section take? In some of the earlier cases it was held on the analogy of the rule in Leake v Robinson,[854] that the gift having failed as to the other grandsons, it was wholly void, and that section too could not take. However, it was held in later cases and also by the Judicial Committee that the rule in Leake v Robinson was a rule of construction of the English law, and that it did not apply to Hindus, and that the incapacity of the other grandsons to take did not incapacitate section from taking, with the result that section took the whole of the property which was the subject-matter of the gift.[855] The sections of the TP Act and the Indian Succession Act which contain the rule against perpetuity did not then apply to Hindus, and Leake v Robinson, therefore, could not possibly apply to Hindu gifts and bequests and ought not to have been applied to them.

The course of legislation is worth observing. First came the Madras Act of 1914. It validated gifts and bequests in favour of unborn persons, and thus removed the bar of incapacity. It also applied for the first time the rule against perpetuity to cases governed by the Act. Similar provisions were introduced by the Hindu Disposition of Property Act, 1916, and the Hindu Transfers and Bequests (City of Madras) Act, 1921. The result of this legislation was that in the case put above, grandsons other than S, though not in existence at the date of the gift, could also take under the deed.

The Indian Succession Act in force when the three Acts were passed was that of 1865. Section 100 related to bequests for the benefit of unborn persons; it is now section 113 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. Section 101 related to the rule against perpetuity; it is now section 114 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. Section 102 related to bequests to a class; this corresponds to section 115 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, before it was amended in 1929. Another Act in force when the three Acts were passed was the Hindu Wills Act, 1870. Certain sections of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, were made applicable to cases governed by the Hindu Wills Act, one of them being section 102. Section 102 was in the following terms:

> If a bequest is made to a class of persons, with regard to some of whom it is inoperative by reason of the rules contained in the two last preceding sections, or, either of them, such bequest shall be wholly void.

Though section 101 was incorporated in all the three Acts, section 102 was not, the intention being to keep alive the rule of Hindu law that if a gift or bequest was made to a class of persons with regard to some of whom it was inoperative by reason of the fact that "they were not in existence at the material date", the gift or bequest failed in regard to those persons only and not in regard to the whole class. However, the legislature, it would appear, overlooked the Hindu Wills Act, and particularly the inclusion in that Act of section 102. This was not noticed until the decision of the Judicial Committee in Soundara Rajan v Natarajan.[856] The will in that case was governed by the Madras Act of 1914. Amongst the properties disposed off by the will, were some immovable properties situated in the city of Madras. This attracted the applicability of the Hindu Wills Act. The testator died in 1904, leaving three daughters, A, B and C. A had four children, three born before, and one after 1904. B has one child born before 1904. C had six children all born after 1904. By his will the deceased directed his trustees to apportion his residuary trust fund into as many equal shares as there were daughters, to pay the income from each of such shares of the daughters for life respectively, and after the death of each daughter to hold the share appropriated to her "upon trust for the children of such daughter who shall attain the age of 21 years". testator was survived by the three daughters. After their death, a suit was brought by the children of the third daughter C, against the children of A and B for construction of the will and for administration of the estate of the testator. The Judicial Committee held that the bequest to the unborn children was invalid under section 101 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, now the Indian Succession Act, 1925, section 114, as it offended the rule against perpetuity, and that the bequest being to a class and being invalid as to some members, it failed also in regard to the children born before the death of the testator under section 102 of that Act (corresponding to the Indian Succession Act, 1925, section 115, before it was amended in 1929). In the case under consideration, the bequest to the children to an unborn person is void, for the Madras Act validated such bequest, but because of the rule against perpetuity contained in section 101. The bequest being void as to some members of the class under section 101, it was wholly void under section 102. This led to the amendment of section 15 of the TP Act, and section 115 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, in the manner stated above. When a gift to a class was bad in accordance with the ordinary rule of English Law, the members of the class take per capita. In the case of a gift made by a Hindu testator, the will must be construed according to the notions of a Hindu and the Hindu Law of succession, and it can be held that the members of the class take per stirpes.[857]

(4) Mahomedan Law as to Gift to a Class

The rule in Leake v Robinson mentioned above has been held not to apply to khojas in Bombay.[858] It has, accordingly, been held that where there is a bequest to a class of persons some of whom are in existence at the testator's death and some are born after his death, the gift fails in regard only to those who were born after the testator's death, and not in regard to the whole class. This decision coincides with the amended section 15. There is no reason why other sects of Mahomedans should be governed by a different rule.

(1) Amendment

This section was amended by the amending Act of 1929.

(2) Principle

The section follows the English law that a limitation following upon a limitation void for remoteness is itself void even though it may not of itself transgress the rule against perpetuity.

857. Jabali Krishna Das v Jetendra Nath, (1949) 51 Bom LR 449.
858. Advocate-General v Karmali, (1905) ILR 29 Bom 133.
859. Subs. by Act 20 of 1929, sec. 10, for sections 16 to 18.

The case of Girjesh Dutt v Data Din[860] cited in the note on section 13 is an illustration of the rule under this section. A made a gift of her property to B her nephew's daughter, for life, and then to B's male descendants, if she should have any, absolutely; but if she should have no male descendants, then to B's daughters without power of alienation; but if there were no descendants of B, male or female, then to her nephew. B died without issue. The gift to the unborn daughters, being of a limited interest and subject to the prior interest of B, was invalid under section 13, and the gift to the nephew, therefore, failed under section 16.

(3) Prior Interest Otherwise Invalid

The prior interest may be invalid otherwise than under the rules contained in sections 13 and 14. It may depend upon a condition precedent which is invalid under section 25. If so the subsequent interest, if it is to take effect after the prior interest, would fail under section 25, for it would also be dependent on the invalid condition. If the subsequent interest is to take effect upon failure of the prior interest and the prior interest is invalid under section 25, the subsequent interest would fail under the combined effect of sections25 and 28.

(4) Prior Interest not Invalid but Subsequently Fails

If the prior interest is not invalid, but subsequently fails because the condition upon which it depends is not fulfilled, section 27 applies, and the subsequent interest is, as a rule, accelerated.

(5) Indian Succession Act

This section corresponds to section 116 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925.

(6) Alternative limitations

The rule does not apply if the subsequent interest is not dependent on the prior interest, but is alternative to it. If there are two alternative limitations, one branch of which is remote and the other capable of taking effect, the court will disregard the void limitation and give effect to that which is legal.[861] An alternative or independent gift or a gift which can take effect independently of a void limitation is valid.[862] Thus, in Monypenny v Derring,[863] the gift was to A for life, then to his first son for life, then to the first son of that first son and his heirs male and in default of such heirs male to other sons of A "and in default of issue of the body of A, or in case of his not leaving any at his decease, for B for life." Lord St Leonards held that the limitation to the unborn grandson of the unborn son was void, but in the event that actual happened, i.e., A not leaving any issue at his decease, the alternative gift to B was valid. There have been other instances of an alternative gift.[864]

(7) Vested Gift

The section in terms hits "any interest created in the same transaction and intended to take effect or upon the failure of such prior interest". Any interest created in the same transaction and intended to take effect immediately and independently of the prior gift, and which does so take effect is clearly not within the mischief of the section. A gift may be vested in interest although it is not vested in possession. An ulterior gift which is vested in interest in praesenti does not fail if the prior gift is bad by reason of sections 13 and 14.

(8) Hindu Law

Some cases decided under the Hindu law are illustrations of the section. In the Tagore case[865] property was bequeathed to A and his male heirs in tail and after the failure or determination of that estate, to B and his male heirs in tail, and then to C and his male heirs in tail. The limitations in tail male were void both under Hindu law, and the rule against perpetuities. A took an estate for life and though B's son and C's grandson were alive at the death of the testator, the estate passed at A's death to the heir at law. Again, in Brajanath v Anandamayi,[866] the testator, not having any great-grandsons living at his death, bequeathed his property to great-grandsons on their attaining majority, and in case there were no great-grandsons, to the daughter's sons. The gift to the great-grandsons was void for remoteness, and the court held that the gift to the daughter's sons was dependent on and not alternative to it, and, therefore, also failed.

Alternative limitations are also illustrated by Hindu law cases. In Javerbai v Kablibai,[867] A by will bequeathed his property to his wife and his brother B for their lives, and after the death of the survivor of them to the male issue of B, and in default of such male issue, to such persons as B may appoint. B had no male issue and exercised the power of appointment in favour of his daughter. The gift to the male issue of B was void, but the gift over under the power of appointment was an independent and alternative gift and, therefore, valid. It should be observed that the daughter took from the testator A and not from B, for under a power of appointment, the property is taken not from the donee of the power, but from the grantor of the power.[868] Another instance is Kumar Tarakeswar Roy v Kumar Shoshi Shikhareswar.[869] A bequeathed his property to three nephews B, C, and D and their descendants in the male line without power of alienation, with a gift over in the following terms: "If any of the nephews should die without leaving a male child, then his share devolves on the surviving nephews and their male descendants." Here the attempt to create an estate in tail male failed and such nephew took an estate for life. However, though the estate in tail male which was dependent on each life-estate failed, the independent gift over from one nephew to another was not affected. On the death of B and C without issue their shares passed to D, but only for a life-estate, for the estate in tail male of the surviving nephew was also void. When the donor made gifts to relations and for charitable purposes, the Privy Council have held that the provisions for his relations would fail in so far as they were contrary to law, and the other dispositions would also fail if they were dependent thereupon and inseparable therefrom, but the invalidity of certain of the gifts to relatives would not be fatal to other dispositions apparently separable, and charitable gifts would not be bad because, though substantial, they did not involve a sufficiently large part of the settled property or because the beneficial interest was not given to a specified individual or individuals. The Privy Council further held that though the settlor had certain religious objects, the case was in its general character one of private bounty and educational trusts. Under sections 14, 16, 17 and 18 of the TP Act non-charitable dispositions bad for perpetuity would not be

(1) Amendment

(2) Accumulation of Income

A direction which separates the income from the ownership of property so as to form a separate fund, or so as to postpone the beneficial enjoyment of property, is a direction for accumulation. The rule against perpetuities has for its object, the circumscription of the period during which the property might be tied up in such a way as to prevent its being transferred absolutely. Earlier, an accumulation of income could be directed for so long as the property could be tied up without infringing the rule against perpetuities. The object of this section is to make a separate rule further restricting the period for the accumulation of income.

A direction for accumulation may be express as well as implied. The question is one of construction, and if the disposition cannot be carried out without an accumulation, the section applies.[872]

(3) Void Under the Rule Against Perpetuities

Independently of this section, a direction for accumulation may be void under the perpetuity rule if the accumulation is directed for a period in excess of that allowed by the perpetuity rule. Thus, if A transfers property to B for life and then to the son of B who shall first attain the age of 25, with a direction to accumulate the income till the son attains that age the direction would be void under the perpetuity rule. However, if A transfers property to B for life, and then to the first son of B who shall attain the age of 18 with a direction to accumulate the income during the lifetime of B and until the son attains that age, there is no infringement of the perpetuity rule, and the direction would be valid for one of the statutory periods allowed by this section.

(4) Void for Repugnancy

Independently of this section, a direction for accumulation may be void for repugnancy. A direction for accumulation is a restriction on enjoyment such as is referred to in section 11. However, while section 11 is limited to transfers which create an absolute interest in the transferee, section 17 refers indifferently to any transfer. Where a transfer is of an absolute interest, the exceptions to this section are also exceptions to section 11. However, if there is an absolute gift, a direction for accumulation for the benefit of the donee, merely postpones enjoyment, and is void for repugnancy. This is illustrated by Indian[873] cases. The first illustration to section 56 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, shows that a direction for the accumulation of the income of a minor is determinable when he attains majority.[874]

(5) Savings Out of Income

The section does not apply to savings out of income made voluntarily by the person entitled to the income, or by the court on behalf of an infant.[875] Nor does it affect the discretionary power of trustees to make accumulations out of a minor's income under section 41 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882.

(6) Powers to Accumulate

In England, the law prohibits any person from settling or disposing of property in such a manner that the income thereof, would be accumulated beyond the periods there indicated.[876] It followed that it hit cases where, though there was no direction to accumulate beyond the permitted periods, there was power to trustees to do so, and where the trustees were in fact accumulating the income beyond the permitted periods or were contemplating doing so. It is submitted that this would not be the case in India where section 17 only prohibits directions providing for an accumulation of income beyond the permitted periods.

(7) Period

The period are expressed to be in the alternative so that an accumulation cannot be directed during a combination of two periods. The appropriate period is a question of construction, and is the one that best accords with the intention expressed in the instruments.[877]

(8) Excessive Accumulation

If accumulation is directed to be for a longer time than that allowed by the section, it is invalid for the excess over the appropriate period, and that income for the excess period as well as the interest on the accumulated fund, belongs to persons, who would have been entitled, if there had been no direction to accumulate.[878]

(9) Failure of Purpose

Where on a true construction of the instrument directing accumulation and investment, the purpose or object to which that accumulation and investment is directed entirely fails, the provision cannot be enforced and the direction for accumulation cannot be read as an independent provision. Thus, where a testator after bequeathing an annuity to his mother directed his trustees out of the income of his residuary estate to pay an annuity to his wife and to accumulate the surplus income during the life of his wife or for 21 years from his death (whichever was the shorter) and directed that at the end of the period of accumulation, the residuary estate including the accumulation for his children should be held on trust for his children, but died without issue, it was held that the testator having died without issue, there was no effective disposal by his will within the meaning of section 49 of the Administration of Estate Act, 1925, of the residuary estate, and that the direction for accumulation was not a direction to which the property not effectively disposed off by the will was subject. The direction for accumulation here came to an end by reason of the failure of its object and purpose, and the widow became entitled to the surplus income as on an intestacy.[879]

(10) Exceptions

The first two exceptions closely follow those in section 164 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The third exception is not in the English Act, but follows the case of Vine v Raleigh.[880]

Exception (i)—Payment of debts

A provision for the payment of debts, not being the debts of the transferor, but payable on a contingency which might happen outside the perpetuity period would be void as infringing the rule against perpetuities. So also, a transfer contingent on the payment of specified debts, for the debts might not be paid within the perpetuity period.[881] However, directions for the payment of debts or provisions for accumulation of income for that purpose, for however long a period, are not only exempt from the statutory restriction on accumulation, but do not infringe the rule against perpetuities. Such a provision does not tie up property absolutely so as to prevent its being transferred absolutely, because the creditor may at any time insist on payment, or the person indebted can at any time discharge the debt.[882] A trust or direction to pay a debt is, therefore, if possible, construed as a charge for the payment of debts, and the transferee is considered as taking a vested interest subject to the charge.[883] Thus, on an assignment of a lease for 99 years, a trust to accumulate half the rent for the whole term, for the payment of the debts of the transferor, would be valid as creating a charge on the lessee's interest. A direction for the payment of debts has been held to be valid even when it is annexed to and forms part of a series of limitations, all or some of which infringe the rule against perpetuities.

The debts may be existing debts, or contingent liabilities to arise in future.[884] If the debts are paid not out of income, but out of capital, the exception ceases to apply and the trust for accumulation of income to recoup capital is valid for one of the statutory periods.[885] If the provision is not made in good faith the exception will not apply.[886] So a provision to accumulate income against a liability that is not likely to become a debt,[887] or to retain and set apart income to create a reserve fund against future liabilities in business[888] is subject to the statutory periods. In order, however, that such a provision falls within the exception, the provision must not be a provision which might or might not be used for the payment of such debts at the discretion of some third person; it ought to be a provision which must be applied for that purpose.[889]

The English exception is wider for it includes the debts of the grantor, settlor, testator or any person and it has been held that the other person may be a stranger.[890]

Exception (ii)—Provision of portions

The word portion ordinarily means a share and points to the raising of something out of something else for the benefit of some children or class of children.[891] It does not apply to the making of additions of income to capital in order to increase the capital for the person to whom it is given.[892] The exception only applies to provisions which must be applied for the provision of portions; and cannot save provisions which may or may not be so applied at the discretion of some third person.[893]

Exception (iii)—Preservation and maintenance

The third exception is not in the English Act, but it has, no doubt, been suggested by the case of Vine v Raleigh,[894] where a trust out of income to maintain houses in good repair was held to be outside the Thellusson Act. A fund provided to meet dilapidations at the end of a lease is within the exception.[895] A direction which simply keeps the property at its prese value is not affected by the rule restricting accumulation of income.[896]

(11) Indian Succession Act

A similar amendment has been made in the corresponding section 117 of Indi Succession Act, 1925.

(12) Hindu law

As stated above, a direction for accumulation for the benefit of the donee was und Hindu law repugnant to an absolute gift.[897] The section is not inconsistent with any rule Hindu law, and is made applicable to Hindus by the amendment of section 2.

The direction is valid, unless the conditions are so unreasonable as to be against pub policy, or unless it is given for an illegal object or its effect is inconsistent with Hindu law Thus, in Krishnaramani v Ananda Krishna[899] there was a trust of surplus income to accumulated, and every time the accumulations amounted to three lakhs, they were to divided among the sons and descendants per stripes. Justice Macpherson said that t direction was part and parcel of a perpetuity and was wholly bad. This is always the ca when the trust for accumulation is not accompanied with any disposition of the corpus of t property.[900] A direction to accumulate surplus income for the benefit of a son to adopted,[901] or for the payment of debts or the benefit of the minor donee,[902] or for t marriage expenses of the testator's son,[903] has been held to be valid.

In Amrito Lall v Surnomoye,[903a] J Jenkins said that for the period of accumulation unc Hindu law "the limit must be that which determines the period during which the course devolution of property can be directed and controlled by the testator". In Gosavi Shivga Rivett-Carnac,[905] where the devise was to a minor disciple for whom a portion of the inco was to be accumulated until he was of the age of 30, it was held that he was entitled to all t income after he attained majority. In the absence of any direction to the contrary, the rule Hindu Law is that accumulations of income go with the capital.[906]

This section was amended by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

Principle

The rules restricting remoteness and perpetuity and against accumulations of income vent fetters being put upon the free circulation and enjoyment of property. However, n property is given for an object beneficial to the public, it is withdrawn from commerce, it is generally necessary that it should be kept intact, and its use restricted to the object an indefinite period.

Some Points of Difference Between English and Indian Law Relating to Perpetuities

(i) The English rule against perpetuities deals with both interests created in praesenti and interests to arise in future; but the rule incorporated in the TP Act (section 14) and the Indian Succession Act, 1925 (section 114) deals with interests to arise in futuro only, and there is no express provision prohibiting or dealing with interests in praesenti which are sought to be made of indefinite duration.

(ii) There is a difference in the period during which vesting may be delayed, the English law allowing 21 years in gross after life or lives in being, the Indian law allowing only the period of majority after a life or lives in being.[909]

(iii) Some interests created in praesenti, eg charitable trusts and unfettered present gifts of such transfers inter vivos may be delayed beyond the period mentioned in section 14. There is no similar relaxation of the rule against perpetuities laid down in section 114 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. On the contrary, section 118 of that Act imposes an additional restriction on charitable or religious bequests by a person who has near relations.

(4) Charitable Trusts

The exception enacted in this section is based on the English law as to charitable trusts. Charitable trusts are trusts for purposes enumerated in the Statute of Charitable Trusts 43 Elix c 4, and those so far analogous as to be within the spirit and intendment of the statute. These purposes have been classified by Lord Macnaghten in the leading case of CIT v Pemsel[911] as (1) for the relief of poverty; (2) for the advancement of education; (3) for the advancement of religion; and (4) other purposes beneficial to the community not falling under any of the preceding heads. A gift merely for the encouragement of sport is not a charity.[912] However, sport may be beneficial to the community and so a gift of playing fields, parks and gymnasiums to promote the health and welfare of the working classes is a charity.[913] So also is a gift for the constitution of a regimental fund for the promotion of outdoor sport, as tending to increase the physical efficiency of the army;[914] or a gift to maintain a library for an officers mess, as tending to increase the mental efficiency of the army[915] or to buy a site for building a public hall,[916] but not so a gift for maintenance of property for the benefit of distinguished visitors to neighbourhood.[917] A bequest for relief to the infirm, sick and aged Roman Catholic priests[918] or for the benefit of the choir[919] has been upheld as a charitable bequest as tending to advance religion. However, a gift to "such charitable institution or institutions or other charitable or benevolent object or objects in England" has been held void for uncertainty by the House of Lords.[920] A gift for the benefit of a volunteer corps has been held to be a charity.[921] A gift for feeding poor pilgrims, distribution of oil among them and saying prayers has also been held in India to be for the benefit of the public within the meaning of this section.[922] A bequest to two charities and to the respective vicars and wardens of two named churches for "parish work" has been held by the House of Lords as not charitable.[923]

The word "charitable" does not occur in this section, but the transfers to which it refers are the same as those described in section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, as trusts created for a public purpose of a charitable or religious nature. The illustration to section 118 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, gives the following list of bequests for religious or charitable uses; the relief of poor people; the maintenance of sick soldiers; the erection or support of a hospital, the education and preferment of orphans; the support of scholars; the erection or support of a school; the building and repair of a bridge; the making of roads, the erection or support of a church; the repairs of a church, the benefit of ministers of religion, and the formation or support of a public garden.

Gifts for charitable uses have been the subject of restrictive legislation in England, i.e., the Mortmain Act, 1736, and the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts of 1888 and 1891. These Acts do not apply in India:[924] but there is a respective provision in section 118 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, designed to prevent deathbed gifts by will to religious or charitable uses by persons having near relations.[925] It is rather anomalous, as pointed out by ACJ Ameer Ali in MAF Halfhyde v CA Saldanha,[926] that no protection is given to the near relations against death-bed gifts to non- religious or non-charitable uses. inter vivos Thus, in John Vallamattom v UOI,[927] the Supreme Court has declared that section 118 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 as unconstitutional and violative of Article 14 of the Constitution of India.

Charitable trusts which create interest in praesenti are not subject to the rule against perpetuity in England in the sense that property may be tied up for an indefinite period for a charitable purpose.[928] In England property may also be tied up indefinitely for even a non-charitable purpose, eg where there is an unfettered gift in praesenti to a perpetual institution so that the corpus and income may be used by the institution as and when it pleases.[929]

In England, these are exceptions to the rule against perpetuities in so far as it deals with estates or interests in praesenti. But charitable trusts to arise in futuro are no exceptions to the English rule which deals with estates or interests in futuro. Therefore, a gift to charity upon a remote event is void,[930] except in the one case of a gift over from one charity to another.[931] This last mentioned exception in English law was followed by a judge of Calcutta High Court in the case of a will where there was a bequest to a charity, and a bequest over upon a remote event to another charity.[932] But in later case,[933] a division bench of the same High Court while construing the same will, held that the positive language of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 precluded the application of that exception in English law, and that the rule against remoteness of vesting in section 101 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865 (section 114 of the 1925 Act) applied to charitable bequests. The court further observed that as to gifts inter vivos, the TP Act had relaxed the rule against remoteness of vesting in the case of charities. This is undoubtedly correct. Not only is a gift inter vivos, to charity upon a remote event valid, but as the rule in section 16 is also relaxed, a gift to charity after prior interests which fails under sections 13 and 14 would be valid. Thus, A settles property on his son and his son's intended wife successively for their lives, and then on their eldest son for his life, and then on the eldest son of such eldest son for his life and then to a charity. The gift to charity would be valid though, if the ultimate beneficiary were not a charity, the gift would fail under section 16 as the prior interests of the son and grandson are void under sections 13 and 14.

(6) Religion

A gift for the advancement of religion is recognized in the section as entitled to the exemption. A gift in perpetuity for the performance of masses for the soul of the donor was held to be bad in one case,[934] and good in another.[935]

A permanent bequest by a Parsi for the performance of muktad ceremonies is valid, for such ceremonies include prayers for the spiritual welfare of all Zoroastrians, and tend to the advancement of Zoroastrain religion.[936]

The dedication of the properties which are gifted in contravention of the rule against perpetuities, in cases where properties are given away partly by way of religious endowments, and partly for the benefit of certain individuals for their use, may be stated thus:

> If the terms of the document under which the properties or their income are gifted, amount to their complete dedication for religious or charitable purposes, then any part thereof which is given by way of gift to any person contrary to the rules against perpetuities enures to the benefit of the endowment and becomes part of properties endowed. But on the other hand, if the dedication is partial, such part which is hit by the rule against perpetuities reverts to the donor or his heirs.[937]

(7) Health

A bequest by an Englishman to a hospital was held to be exempt from the rule against perpetuity.[938]

(8) Beneficial to mankind

The question whether any particular object is for the benefit of the public so as to exempt it from the rule against perpetuity, must be determined with reference to the terms of this section. It is submitted that the words "beneficial to mankind" must be construed ejusdem generis, and as referring to objects of a nature analogous to those specified.

(9) Hindu law

Since the amending Act of 1929, the section applies to Hindus, but the Hindu law has always regarded gifts for religious or charitable purposes as exempt from the rule against perpetuity.[939] Section 18, recognises that the rule against perpetuity under the Act, does not apply to transfer of property for the benefit of public and such exclusion is in-built in Hindu Law itself.[940] A Hindu can make a permanent endowment for maintaining a sadavrat for giving food to travellers;[941] or to Brahmins;[942] or for the performance of religious ceremonies;[943] or for the endowment of a university,[944] or of a hospital.[945] He may even make a permanent gift for the establishment and worship of an idol,[946] as the English law as to superstitious uses does not apply in India.[947] A gift in favour of an idol which would be invalid in English law is not only lawful,[948] but is highly commendable in Hindu law.[949] However, if the object of the gift is uncertain it cannot take effect; and so the Privy Council have held that a gift for dharam is void, the word meaning law, virtue, legal or moral duty.[950] For the same reason, a gift for the spread of the Hindu religion has been held to be void.[951] A direction for accumulation of income for charitable purposes is valid in Hindu law, although it infringes the rule against perpetuity.[952]

(10) Mahomedan law

The section does not apply to Mahomedans, but Mahomedan law allows property to be tied up in perpetuity for religious or charitable purposes. A permanent dedication of property to such objects is called a wakf. Instances of wakf are set out in Mulla's Mahomedan Law. Mahomedan law allows property to be tied up in perpetuity by family settlement, provided the ultimate gift after the extinction of the family is to charity. Such illusory wakf were held by the Privy Council to be invalid,[953] but the practice has received legislative sanction in the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, to which retrospective effect has been given by Act 32 of 1930.[954] A direction for the accumulation of income infringing the law against perpetuity has been held valid in a wakf.[955]

19. Vested interest.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of a person without specifying the time when it is to take effect, or in terms specifying that it is to take effect forthwith or on the happening of an event which must happen, such interest is vested, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer.

A vested interest is not defeated by the death of the transferee before he obtains possession.

Explanation.—An intention that an interest shall not be vested is not to be inferred merely from a provision whereby the enjoyment thereof is post-poned, or whereby a prior interest in the same property is given or reserved to some other person, or whereby income arising from the property is directed to be accumulated until the time of enjoyment arrives, or from a provision that if a particular event shall happen the interest shall pass to another person.

(1) Vested Interest

Vested interests as defined in this section are to be distinguished from contingent interests as defined in section 21. Where an interest is vested, the transfer is complete, but when an interest is contingent, the transfer depends upon a condition precedent. When that condition is fulfilled, the transfer takes effect and the interest is vested. If the condition refers to an event, which is certain to occur, the interest dependent upon it is not contingent, but is vested. If it is an uncertain event, it is contingent, for the condition may never be fulfilled and the transfer may never take effect. Thus, a gift to A on the death of B creates a vested interest in A even during B's lifetime, for there is nothing more certain than death. However, a gift to A on the marriage of B creates only a contingent interest, for B may never marry; but that contingent interest becomes vested if and when B marries.

The distinction between a vested and a contingent interest may seem simple, but in practice, it is not always easy to distinguish the one from the other. The difficulty arises from the fact that a vested interest is not necessarily in possession. An interest may be vested and not yet in possession in any one of the three cases referred to in the explanation, i.e., (1) by a provision postponing enjoyment; or (2) by the intervention of a prior interest; or (3) by a provision for accumulation. Again, an interest may be vested although, it is liable to be divested by a condition subsequent. The difference between a condition precedent and a condition subsequent is that when the condition is precedent, the estate is not in the grantee until the condition is performed, but when the condition is subsequent the estate vests immediately in the grantee, and remains in him till the condition is broken. Conditions subsequent are dealt with in sections 28 and 31. The question whether an interest is vested or contingent arises most frequently in wills, and is best explained by the illustrations to the corresponding section in the Indian Succession Act, 1925 quoted below.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925—Illustrations of Vested Interest

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, is section 119. To it are appended the following illustrations:

(i) A bequeaths to B 100 rupees, to be paid to him at the death of C. On A's death the legacy becomes vested in interest in B, and if he dies before C, his representatives are entitled to the legacy.

(ii) A bequeaths to B 100 rupees, to be paid upon his attaining the age of 18. On A's death the legacy becomes vested in interest in B.

(iii) A fund is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B. On the testator's death, the legacy to B becomes vested in interest in B.

(iv) A fund is bequeathed to A until B attains the age of 18 and then to B. The legacy to B is vested in interest from the testator's death.

(v) A bequeaths the whole of his property to B upon trust to pay certain debts out of the income, and then to make over the fund to C. At A's death the gift to C becomes vested in interest in him.

(vi) A fund is bequeathed to A, B and C in equal shares to be paid to them on their attaining the age of 18, respectively, with a proviso that, if all of them die under the age of 18, the legacy shall devolve upon D. On the death of the testator, the shares vested in interest in A, B and C, subject to be divested in case A, B and C shall all die under 18, and, upon the death of any of them (except the last survivor) under the age of 18, his vested interest passes, so subject, to his representatives.

In illustration (i), the interest of B takes effect on the happening of an event that this is certain, and so it is vested.

In illustration (ii), the interest is one of which the enjoyment is postponed. It illustrates the well-settled rule that the words "to be paid" or "payable" at a certain age do not render a bequest contingent.[956] On the other hand, a gift stating "at" a certain age, or "if" or "when" a certain age is attained, or upon attaining a certain age, is contingent,[957] as is shown by the second illustration to section 120 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925.[958]

In illustration (iii), a prior interest intervenes, but the legacy is vested as the determination of that prior interest is a certain event.

In illustration (iv), it might be supposed that B's interest was contingent on his attaining the age of 18, but it is construed as a gift to A for a term of years with remainder to B. It rests on the principle that the law favours the vesting of estates. Re Blackwell,[959] MR Pollock quoted with approval the following passage from Hawkins on Wills:

> In the construction of devises of real estates, it has long been an established rule for the guidance of courts... that all estates are to be holden vested, except estates in the devise of which a condition precedent is so clearly expressed, that the court cannot treat them as vested without deciding in the direct opposition to the terms of the will.

In this matter the law in India makes no distinction between real and personal property. The rule applies here both to immovable and movable property. In illustration (v), there is a divestment after the payment of debts. Jarman says that such a devise confers an immediately vested interest, the payment of debt constituting only a charge.[960]

In illustration (vi), the words "to be paid" import as in illustration (ii) a vested interest, but that interest, is liable to be divested on the happening of the event specified and vested in another person. This is an instance of a conditional limitation, i.e. an interest liable to be divested by a condition subsequent and vested in someone else. Conditional limitations are the subject of section 28.

(3) Enjoyment Postponed

A condition postponing enjoyment does not prevent the interest vesting immediately; but it is itself void for repugnancy after the transferee has attained majority.[961] An unequivocal and irrevocable settlement conferring enjoyment rights over the property in present and each getting a specific share in it upon the death of the settlor would create a vested interest in favour of each of the beneficiary.[962]

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers property to B in trust for C, and directs B to give possession of the property to C when he attains the age of 25. C has a vested interest and is entitled to possession at the age of 18.

The appointment of an executor or guardian during the minority of the devisee with a direction to hand over the property on his attaining majority does not postpone the vesting of the bequest.[963] When the rights of an adopted son are curtailed by an agreement giving the widow of the adoptive father the right to enjoy the property during her lifetime, the interest of the son is a vested interest which he can dispose off.[964]

ILLUSTRATION

A executed a deed of gift in favour of B, but directed that B was not to take possession of a portion of the property until after the deaths of A and A's wife. B has a vested interest, enjoyment only being postponed.[965]

(4) Prior interest

A condition postponing enjoyment[966] or creation of a prior interest does not postpone the vesting of the subsequent interest. This is the case put in illustration (iii) to section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925: "A fund is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B. On the testator's death the legacy becomes vested in interest in B". The expression "after his death" refers to the time when the gift becomes reduced to possession, and not to the time when the interest vests. A bequest to A from and after his attaining the age of 18 is prima facie contingent, because it is postponed until the happening of an event which may never happen. But a bequest to B for life and then to A from and after the death of B vests immediately in A, for enjoyment is postponed until the termination of a life estate, an event which must happen.[967] In Rewun Persad v Radha Beeby[968] a case decided under Hindu law, the testator gave his wife a life estate, and after her death one moiety of the estate to his brother B, and the other moiety to his sons C and D. B and C died during the lifetime of the widow, but as their shares were vested, and as C and D took as tenants in common, C's widow was entitled to succeed to C's share. In Bhagabati v Kali Charan[969] the bequest was to the mother for life, then to the wife for her life, and then to the nephews, and it was held that the nephews took a vested and transmittable interest on the death of the testator. In Chunilal v Bai Muli[970] there was a bequest to a widow for life and then to a daughter, and the daughter took an immediate vested interest.

ILLUSTRATION

Property is settled in trust for A for life with a direction to the trustees to pay A ₹2,000 a year out of rents and profits and to apply the balance to the discharge of a mortgage; and after A's death to convey the land to B. Although B may not survive, yet B's interest is vested in A's lifetime.[971]

A question arose before the Supreme Court in Rajes Kanta Roy v Santi Debi[972] as to whether the interest which devolved upon two minor sons under a settlement made by the father was vested or contingent. The settlement provided in substance that the sons would obtain an absolute interest upon the death of the father, and after discharging the debts of the father. The court observed that the settlor clearly contemplated that there would be, as infact, there was, a surplus after the payment of the debts, and held:

> Now there can be no doubt about the rule that where the enjoyment of the property is postponed but the present income thereof is to be applied for the benefit of the donee, the gift is vested and not contingent...This rule operates normally where the entire income is applied for the benefit of the donee. The distinguishing feature in this case is that it is not the entire income that is available to the donees for their actual use but only a portion thereof. But it is to be observed that according to the scheme of the trust-deed, the reason for limiting the enjoyment of the income to a specified sum thereof, is obviously in order to facilitate and bring about the discharge of the debts. As already explained the underlying scheme of the trust-deed is that the enjoyment is to be restricted until the debts are discharged. Whatever may be said of such a provision where a donee is not himself a person who is under any legal obligation aliunde to discharge such debts, the position in this case is different. The two sons are themselves persons who, if the testator died intestate, would be under an obligation to discharge his debts out of the properties which devolve upon them. It is only the surplus which would be legally available for division between them. In such a case, the balance of the income which is meant to be applied for the discharge of the debts is also an application for the income for the benefit of the donees. These arrangements taken together clearly indicate that what is postponed is not the very vesting of the property in the lots themselves but that the enjoyment of the income thereof is burdened with certain monthly payments and with the obligation to discharge debts therefrom notionally pro rata all of which taken together constitute application of the income for his benefit.[973]

The court also relied on the provision that if either of the sons died before the discharge of the debts, his heirs were entitled to the share of the son, which was a further indication that the interest of the sons was a vested interest. Where A settled property in favour of B authorizing him to collect rent of his house, no vested interest is created in favour of B.[974]

(5) Accumulation of Income

A direction for accumulation of income if in excess of the period sanctioned by section 17 is invalid for the excess. Within the limits sanctioned by the section, it is a provision for the postponement of enjoyment; and as such it does not postpone the vesting of the interest.[975] The first illustration to section 56 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 shows that a direction for the accumulation of the income of a minor is ineffective after he attains majority.

(6) Conditional Limitation

A provision that if a particular event shall happen the interest shall pass to another person is what is called in English law a conditional limitation. A conditional limitation divests an estate which has vested, and vests it in another person. A condition subsequent divests an estate which has vested and revests it in the grantor. Section 28 deals with conditional limitations, while conditions subsequent are dealt with in section 31.

A conditional limitation, therefore, does not prevent an estate from vesting; on the contrary, the condition itself implies that the estate which preceded it had vested. This is explained in Sundar Bibi v Rajendra Narain.[976] In that case, the terms of a compromise provided that L should have an estate for life, and that after his death R was to be full owner of the estate, if he survived L; but that if he did not survive L, the estate would pass to lineal male descendants of R according to the rule of primogeniture. Before the death of L the question arose whether R had only a contingent interest, or a vested interest which could be attached. Now if the provision had been merely this that the estate would pass to R, if he survived L and nothing more had been said, there can be no doubt that R would have had an estate contingent on his surviving L. But the further provision of a gift over to another person was a conditional limitation, which had the effect of vesting the estate in R. The reason given by the court was that the condition affected the retention of the interest, and not in its acquisition. R, therefore, took a vested interest liable to be divested if he did not survive L. A very similar case is Raja Lal Bahadur v Rajendra Narain.[977] A compromise between two brothers L and R provided that L was to have a life interest and that if R survived L, R would be "permanent owner with power of transfer and transmitting inheritance", but that if R did not so survive, "his male descendants according to the rule of lineal primogeniture will be entitled to the said property". This was held to confer, not contingent, but an immediate vested interest in R, although the estate tail in the event of R not surviving L was probably invalid. A condition precedent followed by a gift over is generally construed as a conditional limitation so as to favour the vesting of the prior estate.

(7) Time of Vesting

As soon as the transfer is complete, the interest vests. Words are to be construed according to their ordinary meaning, and no particular form of words is necessary to effect a vesting.[978]

(8) Power of Appointment

A power of appointment confers upon the donee of the power, a right of disposition of the property of the creator of the power, i.e., the appointor. The power may be either general, to appoint to any one the donee pleases, or special, to appoint anyone of a specified class of persons. The appointee or person in whose favour the donee exercises the power derives title from the creator of the power, and not from the donee. However, the property vests when the power is exercised, and not when it is created.[979] Until the power is exercised the property does not vest in the donee of the power; but if there is an independent gift to a class with a power to apportion the shares of each member of the class, the property vests by virtue of the gift even though the power is not exercised.[980] Again, the power may be such that it is the duty of the donee to exercise it, and in that case if there is no gift over,[981] the court will imply a gift for the objects of the power.[982]

(9) Contrary Intention

The grantor may, however, specify the time of vesting;[983] for under section 5 a transfer may be not only in the present, but also in the future.[984] However, the time of vesting cannot be beyond the period allowed by the rule against perpetuity. A deed of settlement gave life estate to X, with remainder to his children not in existence at the time of settlement. It was held that the interest of the children was a contingent one. Unborn children could be beneficiaries under the trust, but they could claim a vested interest only after the death of the holder of the life estate if such an intention was expressed in the deed.[985]

(10) Death of Transferee

When an interest is vested, it becomes the property of the transferee and is, under section 6, transferable by him even before he has obtained possession; for a transfer of property not in possession is effective. If the transferee dies, his interest vests in his representatives, irrespective of whether he had obtained possession.[986] One of the factors for determining whether an interest is vested or contingent, is whether the property devolves on the heirs of the transferee or reverts to the estate.[987]

(11) Hindu Law

The amendment of section 2 makes section 19 applicable to Hindus. Section 106 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, was applied to Hindu wills by the Hindu Wills Act, 1870; and section 119 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 is applied to some Hindu wills by section 57, and Sch III of the same Act. The principle of the section has always been recognised by Hindu law, and some of the cases noted were decided under that law. The case of Gosling v Gosling[988] has been followed in cases decided under Hindu law. Thus, in Gosavi Shivgar v Rivettcarnac[989] there was a bequest of property to a minor with a direction that it should not be given to him till he attained the age of 30, but the direction was held to be inoperative after he attained majority. On the other hand, as there was a charge on the income for the maintenance of another disciple, the trustee was allowed to retain the corpus till the age of 30, paying the devisee the whole income subject to the charge. In Ram Kaur v Atma Singh,[990] the testator devised his estate to his sons and directed that the widow should manage it during her lifetime, but it had held that the estate vested immediately in the sons, and as the widow was given no prior interest, they were entitled to immediate possession. On the other hand, in Srinivasa v Dandayudapani,[991] there was a bequest to a daughter with a direction to enjoy the income and pass the corpus intact to her son. The daughter took a vested interest, but the direction was ineffective and the son who predeceased her took no interest at all. It has also been held under a Hindu law that the creation of partial trusts and charges will not postpone the vesting in possession.[992] When a testator made a provision for an allowance to his widow and directed the estate to be divided by the executors between themselves at her death, the executors took an immediate vested interest although they died before the widow.[993] A bequest to a daughter of a house after the mortgage debt has been paid is not contingent, but creates a present vested interest.[994]

In Palchuri Hanumayamma v Tadikamalla Kotlingam,[995] the Supreme Court found section 19 to be inapplicable on facts due to enactment of section 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. In this case, as per the will, the testator's wife was to manage the property allotted to her daughters during her lifetime, and after her lifetime the properties identified as individual shares of the three daughters were to be inherited by the said daughters. However, during her lifetime, the testator's wife disposed of the entire property to the exclusion of one of the daughters. It was held that due to enactment of section 14 prior to the testator's wife's death, her right got enlarged into an absolute estate and she became an absolute owner of the property and, therefore, section 19 has no relevance.

(12) Mahomedan Law

Sunni law does not recognise an estate for life with a vested remainder.[996] There is some doubt as to whether the law on this point has been altered by the decision of the Privy Council in Amjad Khan v Ashraf Khan.[997] It led to a difference of opinion in a case decided by Bombay High Court.[998] Such estates are recognised in Shia law,[999] and in the case of a talukdari estate owned by a Mahomedan family in Oudh.[1000] A life estate with a vested remainder is recognised both for Shias and Sunnis by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, in the case of wakfs.

20. When unborn person acquires vested interest on transfer for his benefit.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created for the benefit of a person not then living, he acquires upon his birth, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer, a vested interest, although he may not be entitled to the enjoyment thereof immediately on his birth.

There is no ban on the transfer of interest in favour of an unborn person. Section 20 permits an interest being created for the benefit of an unborn person who acquires interest upon his birth.[1001]

(1) When Unborn Person Acquires Vested Interest on Transfer for His Benefit

An interest created for the benefit of an unborn person vests as soon as that person is born. Thus, if A settles property on himself and his intended wife for their joint lives and then on the eldest son of their marriage, the son takes a vested interest as soon as he is born.

It does not matter that he is not entitled to possession during the lifetime of his parents. Nor will the vesting be affected by a provision that if his parents die during his minority, the trustees should not deliver possession to him until he attains majority.

Under section 13 it is necessary that the estate which vests in the unborn person must be the whole remainder. In English law, it is possible to limit an estate to A for life, then to A's unborn eldest son for life, and then to B. In this case until A's son is born the estate vests in A with a contingent remainder to his son, and with a vested remainder to B. But as soon as the son is born, the estate is in A with a vested remainder to the son, with a vested remainder to B. However, under this Act, the interest of the son fails by reason of section 13, and that of B fails under section 16. Where, however, a disposition by A is to his grandson B, and such of C's sons as were born when B attained majority, the disposition is not hit by section 13. C's son who was born after the disposition, but before B attained majority, obtains a vested interest under this section on his birth.[1002] A contrary intention that the estate shall not vest at birth may appear as when the interest is contingent, eg a transfer to A and B for their joint lives, and then to the son of their intended marriage who shall first attain the age of 18 years.

Under Hindu law as amended by statute, no transfer or bequest by a Hindu shall be invalid by reason only that any person for whose benefit it may have been made was not born at the date of such disposition.

21. Contingent interest.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of a person to take effect only on the happening of a specified uncertain event, or if a specified uncertain event shall not happen, such person thereby acquires a contingent interest in the property. Such interest becomes a vested interest, in the former case, on the happening of the event, in the latter, when the happening of the event becomes impossible.

Exception.—Where, under a transfer of property, a person becomes entitled to an interest therein upon attaining a particular age, and the transferor also gives to him absolutely the income to arise from such interest before he reaches that age, or directs the income or so much thereof as may be necessary to be applied for his benefit, such interest is not contingent.

(1) Contingent Interest

The distinction between a contingent interest and a vested interest has been explained in note (1) to section 19. If the transfer is subject to a condition precedent, there is no transfer at all until the condition is fulfilled. Till then the interest is contingent on the condition being fulfilled. When the condition is fulfilled, the transfer takes effect and the interest becomes vested.[1003]

The specified uncertain event may be one which depends upon the will of the intended transferee, eg execution of a deed, or payment of a sum of money. The performance of such conditions is the subject of section 26.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925—Illustrations of Contingent Interest

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, is section 120. The following are the illustrations to that section:

(i) A legacy is bequeathed to D in case A, B and C shall all die under the age of 18; D has a contingent interest in the legacy until A, B and C die under 18, or one of them attains that age.

(ii) A sum of money is bequeathed to A "in case he shall attain the age of 18" or "when he shall attain the age of 18". A's interest in the legacy is contingent until the condition is fulfilled by his attaining that age.

(iii) An estate is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B if B shall then be living; but if B shall not then be living to C. A, B and C survive the testator, B and C each take a contingent interest in the estate until the event which is to vest it in one or in the other has happened.

(iv) An estate is bequeathed as in the last case supposed. B dies in the lifetime of A and C. Upon the death of B, C acquires a vested right to obtain possession of the estate upon A's death.

(v) A legacy is bequeathed to A when she shall attain the age of 18, or shall marry under that age with the consent of B, with a proviso that, if she neither attains 18 nor marries under that age with B's consent, the legacy shall go to C. A and C each take a contingent interest in the legacy. A on attaining the age of majority, becomes absolutely entitled to the legacy although she may have married under 18 without the consent of B.

(vi) An estate is bequeathed to A until he shall marry and after that event to B. B's interest in the bequest is contingent until the condition is fulfilled by A's marrying.

(vii) An estate is bequeathed to A until he shall take advantage of any law for the relief of insolvent debtors, and after that event, to B. B's interest in the bequest is contingent until A takes advantage of such a law.

(viii) An estate is bequeathed to A if he shall pay 500 rupees to B. A's interest in the bequest is contingent until he has paid 500 rupees to B.

(ix) A leaves his farm of Sultanpur Khurd to B, if B shall convey his own farm of Sultanpur Buzurg to C. B's interest in the bequest is contingent until he has conveyed the latter farm to C.

(x) A fund is bequeathed to A if B shall not marry C within five years after the testator's death. A's interest in the legacy is contingent until the condition is fulfilled by the expiration of the five years without B's having married C, or by the occurrence within that period of an event which makes the fulfilment of the condition impossible.

(xi) A fund is bequeathed to A if B shall not make any provision for him by will. The legacy is contingent until B's death.

(xii) A bequeaths to B 500 rupees a year upon his attaining the age of 18, and directs that the interest, or a component part thereof, shall be applied for his benefit until he reaches that age. The legacy is vested.

(xiii) A bequeaths to B 500 rupees when he shall attain the age of 18, and directs that a certain sum, out of another fund, shall be applied for his maintenance until he arrives at that age. The legacy is contingent.

In Illustration (ii), the instances that a bequest "at" a given age,[1004] or "upon attaining" or "as" the legatee shall attain, or "after" his attaining a given age is prima facie contingent.[1005]

In illustration (v), the conditions are in the alternative and it is sufficient if one is fulfilled.[1006]

In illustration (vii), the condition of defeasance on insolvency is a condition subsequent as regards A, but a condition precedent as regards B. Such a condition is invalid in a transfer inter vivos.[1007]

In illustration (x), the condition is a negative condition which is discharged by the event becoming impossible. The marriage of B and C would be rendered impossible by the death of either party or by the marriage of B or C with another person.[1008]

In illustration (xii) and (xiii), the exception to the section is referred to.

In illustration (xiii), the income is of another fund, and so the exception does not apply.

(3) Additional Instances of Contingent Interest

The following are some of the decisions on contingent interest illustrating contingent interests occurring in wills:

(1) Bequest to a daughter for life and after her death to her lawful children who being a son shall attain the age of 21, or who being a daughter shall attain that age or marry—held that the interest of a son was contingent till he attained the age of 21 and then became vested.[1009]

(2) Bequests to five sons in equal shares with a condition that in the event of any son dying without sons or son's sons, his share will be taken by the surviving sons—held that each son gets a life-estate, but the absolute estate of each son was contingent on his leaving a son or a son's son upon death.[1010]

(3) Bequests to wife and son whom she was empowered to adopt, with a provision that if she died without adopting a son or if the son died in her lifetime, the estate should pass to a sister's son. Held that the nephew had a contingent interest which was vested when the adopted son died without issues in the lifetime of the widow.[1011]

(4) Condition Precedent Construed as a Condition Subsequent

A condition precedent, when followed by a gift over, is sometimes construed as a condition subsequent so that the interest dependent on it is not contingent, but vested. Thus, a devise to A "if" or "when" he attains the age of majority, with a gift over in the event of his dying under that age, has been held to be a condition subsequent so that A takes a vested interest liable to be divested by his death under the age specified. Similarly, a devise to A if or when he shall attain a given age, with a limitation over on his death under that age without issue, confers a vested estate on A defeasible only in the event of his death without issue under the specified age.[1012] The English Courts have adopted two rules of construction, namely: (1) that the gift of income of the same fund, until the contingency happens, to the very person who will on attaining a particular age take the fund makes the gift of the fund, apparently contingent upon the attainment of that age, a vested interest; and (2) that a gift over upon failure of a prior gift may have the effect of converting the prior gift apparently contingent upon attaining of a particular age into a vested interest, subject to be divested on the death before that age. The first of the above two rules of constructions have been adopted in India by the exception to section 21. The second rule has not been adopted in any section of TP Act or the Indian Succession Act, 1925. It is submitted that in such circumstances, there is no reason for importing here the second rule about which the English courts have taken divergent views. This opinion has been expressed in a case of Calcutta High Court.[1013]

(5) Spes Successionis

A mere spes successionis is neither a contingent interest, nor a vested interest.[1014]

(6) Exception

Illustrations of the exceptions are given in section 120 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, and have already been quoted in note (2) above and illustration (xii) and illustration (xiii), and contrasted in illustration (xii) with illustration (xiii). Under the exception, there must be either a gift of the interest, or a direction to apply it. The gift of interest in a legacy involves an immediate gift, for the particular legacy has to be immediately separated from the bulk of the property in order to provide for the interest.[1015] If there is no gift of the income, there must be a direction to apply it for the benefit of the minor. However, in order that a case falls within the exception, it is necessary that the direction relates to the whole of the income.[1016]

The exception in the corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, was considered in a case before the Privy Council.[1017] A Parsi by will appointed his brother his executor, and directed him to bring up and maintain the child which his wife was expecting, and to maintain himself and the family "out of my property and effects." If the child was a son, the will directed that he "shall be cherished and maintained and educated and when he comes of age my executor shall make over the whole of my remaining properties to my son". Their Lordships held that the case was not within the exception because, (1) there is no gift out of any ascertainable fund to the son; (2) the executor was to maintain not only the son, but also the whole family; and (3) he was entitled to spend not only the income, but also the corpus. It has been held that the exception applies only to the case where a fund is given to a person "on his attaining a particular age". It has no relation to any other contingency eg his surviving a named person.[1018]

The exception has no reference to gifts to a contingent class, and it is submitted that in India the principle of the exception cannot be extended to a gift to a contingent class.[1019]

22. Transfer to members of a class who attain a particular age.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of such members only of a class as shall attain a particular age, such interest does not vest in any member of the class who has not attained that age.

(1) Contingent Class

The case dealt with in this section is a gift to a contingent class. This is not the same thing as a gift to a class on a contingency. Thus, a gift to the children of A in case B dies without issue, is a gift to a class on a contingency. However, a gift to such of the children of A who shall attain the age of 18, is a gift to a contingent class. No child of A has vested interest until he has attained that age,[1020] and until then he does not completely answer the description of the transferee.[1021] Until then his interest is contingent even though there may be a gift over.

(2) Ascertainment of Class

For the ascertainment of a class, the rule is that the objects of the testator's bounty should be ascertained as soon as possible. In the case of a gift to the children of A when they attain the age of 18, the class is ascertained when the first child of A attains 18, and no child born after that time can take.[1022] Similarly, if the gift is to A for life, and then to such of B's children as attain the age of 18, then if a child of B has attained the age of 18 in A's lifetime, the class is ascertained on the death of A, and no child born after A's death can take.[1023] In the first case, the class consists of the children of A who are in existence when the first child of A attains the age of 18. In the second case, the class consists of the children of B in existence at the death of A, provided one of them has attained the age of 18 in the lifetime of A. If no child of B has attained the age of 18 in the lifetime of A, any child of B born before the first child of B reaches 18 becomes a member of the class subject to his attaining the age of 18 years.

(3) Not Contingent

If the gift is to the children of A to be divided among them when they attain the age of 18, there is no contingency at all, and the children take an immediate vested interest,[1024] and enjoyment only is postponed.

(4) Indian Succession Act, 1925

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, is section 121. The illustration to that section is as follows:

> A fund is bequeathed to such of the children of A as shall attain the age of 18, with a direction that, while any child of A shall be under the age of 18, the income of the share, to which it may be presumed he will be eventually entitled, shall be applied to his maintenance and education. No child of A who is under the age of 18 has a vested interest in the bequest.

(5) Exception to section 21 Not Applicable to Contingent Class

The above illustration under section 121 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 can be compared with illustration (xii) under section 120 of that Act which explains the meaning of the exception to the last mentioned section. It is clear that the exception to section 120 does not apply in the case of a bequest to a contingent class, for despite the provision for maintenance, the interest is not vested. Although no illustrations are given under sections 21 or 22 of the TP Act, the meaning of those sections must be the same as those of the corresponding sections 120 and 121 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 as explained by the illustrations. It follows, therefore, that the exception to section 21 does not apply in the case of a contingent class, for despite a provision for maintenance, the share is not vested. It has been so held in a case by Calcutta High Court.[1025] In De Souza v Vaz[1026] J Farran said—

> The same rule, however, does not apply where there is a gift of an entire fund payable to a class of persons equally upon their attaining a certain age. There a direction to apply the income of the whole fund, in the meantime, for their maintenance does not create a vested interest in a member of the class who does not attain that age.

23. Transfer contingent on happening of specified uncertain event.— Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is to accrue to a specified person if a specified uncertain event shall happen, and no time is mentioned for the occurrence of that event, the interest fails unless such event happens before, or at the same time as, the intermediate or precedent interest ceases to exist.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925..... 181

(1) Subsequent Contingent Interest

The case put in this section is that of a prior interest followed by a subsequent contingent interest. The contingent interest cannot vest until the event on which it is contingent happens. If that happens sometime after the prior interest has determined, there is a gap or interval during which the estate would be in suspense and would be a res nullius. The section, therefore, enacts that the contingent interest will fail or cannot vest, unless the event happens before or at the same time as the prior interest ceases. Thus, if there is a gift for life to A, and then to B in case B gets called to the Bar, the gift to B fails, unless he is called to the Bar in the lifetime of A or at the same time as A dies.[1027]

The rule in this section corresponds to the English real property rule that every contingent remainder must vest during the continuance of the particular estate which supports it or eo instanti that such particular estate determines.

In a Madras case,[1028] the testator disinherited his son, and left his estate to the grandson or grandsons who might be born within 10 years after his death. Justice Ramesam said that the result was that there would be an interval of 10 years after the testator's death during which the estate is not vested in any person, and that for this reason the disposition was void. In Gadadhar Mullick v Official Trustee of Bengal,[1029] it was held that the artificial rule of English real property law that every contingent gift must be supported by a prior estate, and that it must vest at least eo instanti the determination of the particular estate which supports it, ought not to be imported to India for Hindu law. Soorjeemony's case[1030] and Gadadhar Mullick's case,[1031] though cases of contingent bequests in a will, are, it is submitted, applicable to contingent gifts inter vivos governed by Hindu law as unmodified by legislation.[1032]

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925

The section corresponds to section 124 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, according to which if no period is specified, a contingent bequest fails, unless the event on which it is contingent happens before the period of distribution.

The following are the illustrations to the section:

(i) A legacy is bequeathed to A, and in case of his death, to B. If A survives the testator, the legacy to B does not take effect.

(ii) A legacy is bequeathed to A, and in case of his death without children to B. If A survives the testator or dies in his lifetime leaving a child, the legacy to B does not take effect.

(iii) A legacy is bequeathed to A when and if he attains the age of 18 and, in case of his death, to B. A attains the age of 18. The legacy to B does not take effect.

(iv) A legacy is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death to B, "in case of B's death without children" to C. The words "in case of B's death without children" are to be understood as meaning in case B dies without children during the lifetime of A.

(v) A legacy is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death to B, and, "in case of B's death" to C. The words "in case of B's death" are to be considered as meaning "in case B dies in the lifetime of A."

In Chunilal v Bai Samrath,[1033] where the testator bequeathed his property to his two sons with a proviso that in case of either dying without male issue, his share was to go to the survivor, the gift over to the surviving son was contingent on the death of the other son without male issue. The Privy Council held that the gift over was effective although the other son died two years after the testator. This was a case to which the Hindu Wills Act did not apply; but in other cases in which section 111 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, was applicable, or was made applicable by the Hindu Wills Act, it was held that the prior gift was absolute and indefeasible on the death of the testator.[1034]

(3) Section to be Applied Only to Cases Strictly Coming Within its Scope

In Bhupendra v Amarendra[1035] the Judicial Committee observed, with reference to section 11 of the Succession Act, 1865, now reproduced in section 124 of the Succession Act, 1925, which corresponds to section 23 of this Act:

> section 111 embodies the rule enunciated in Edwards v Edwards.[1036] The rule of construction laid down in that case has been considerably modified by later English decisions. The Indian Act, however, has given it statutory force...Their Lordships think that it should be applied only to cases strictly coming within its scope.

In that case, time was mentioned for the occurrence of the specified uncertain event and consequently, section 111 was not applied, for that section applied only when no time was mentioned for the occurrence of the event. It will be noticed that section 23 is concerned with a gift to a specified person upon certain contingency. Although in section 124 of the Succession Act, 1925, which corresponds to this section, the expression "specified person" is not used, the illustration to that section clearly indicates that the contingent bequest contemplated by that section is one to a specified person. Section 23 of TP Act and section 124 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, therefore, like the exceptions to section 21 of TP Act and section 120 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, have no reference to a gift or bequest to a contingent class. It has already been submitted that the exceptions to the last mentioned sections do not apply to a gift or bequest to a contingent class. On a parity of reasoning, section 23 of TP Act and section 124 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 ought not to apply to a gift or bequest to a contingent class. A gift or bequest to a contingent class does not strictly come within the scope of section 23 of TP Act or section 124 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, for those sections are concerned with gifts or bequests to specified persons and, on the authority of the observations of the Judicial Committee quoted above, those sections should not be applied to a gift or bequest to a contingent class.[1037]

24. Transfer to such of certain persons as survive at some period not specified.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is to accrue to such of certain persons as shall be surviving at some period, but the exact period is not specified, the interest shall go to such of them as shall be alive when the intermediate or precedent interest ceases to exist, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the transfer.

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers property to B for life, and after his death to C and D, equally to be divided between them, or to survivor of them. C dies during the life of B. D survives B. At B's death the property passes to D.

Synopsis

(1) Gift to Survivor ..... 171 (2) Indian Succession Act, 1925..... 183

(1) Gift to Survivor

This section enacts a rule of construction and is best explained by the following passage from the judgment of LJ Turner in White v Barker.[1038]

> Where there is a bequest to A for life and after his death to B and C or the survivor of them, some meaning must of course be attached to the words "the survivor." They may refer to any one of three events—to one of the persons named surviving the other, or to one of them only surviving the testator, or to one of them only surviving the tenant for life, and in the absence of any indication to the contrary, they are taken to refer to the latter event as being the more probable one to have been referred to.

The corresponding section in the Indian Succession Act, 1925, is section 125. Under that section, the period of survivorship is the time of payment or distribution, unless a contrary intention appears from the terms of the will. The general rule is established by the leading case of Cripps v Wolcott,[1039] where VC Leach stated the rule as follows:

> I consider it, however, to be well settled, that if a legacy be given to two or more, equally to be divided between them, or to the survivor of them, and there is no special intent to be found in the will, that the survivorship is to be referred to the period of division. If there be no previous interest given in the legacy, then the period of division is the death of the testator, and the survivors at his death will take the whole legacy...But if a previous life estate be given, then the period of division is the death of the tenant for life, and the survivors at his death will take the whole legacy.

The section in the Indian Succession Act, 1925 has the following illustrations:

(i) Property is bequeathed to A and B to be equally divided between them or to the survivor of them. If both, A and B survive the testator, the legacy is equally divided between them. If A dies before the testator, and B survives the testator, it goes to B.

(ii) Property is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death, to B and C, to be equally divided between them, or to the survivor of them. B dies during the lifetime of A; C survives A. At A's death the legacy goes to C (see the illustration to the present section 24).[1040]

(iii) Property is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death, to B and C, or the survivor, with a direction that, if B should not survive the testator, his children are to stand in his place. C dies during the life of the testator; B survives the testator, but dies in the lifetime of A. The legacy goes to the representative of B.

(iv) Property is bequeathed to A for life, and, after his death, to B and C, with a direction that, in case either of them dies in the lifetime of A, the whole shall go to the survivor. B dies in the lifetime of A. Afterwards, C dies in the lifetime of A. The legacy goes to the representative of C.

In the first illustration, no antecedent interest precedes the gift, and the period of distribution is the death of the testator. In Ellokassee Dassee v Durponarai,[1041] the testator left his property to his two sons, an infant grandson, and a widow in equal shares, and directed that "if any of these four persons happen to die, the survivors of them will receive this estate in equal shares; but if there be a son or grandson surviving as heir and representatives of the party dying, such survivor shall succeed to his share;...so long as my infant grandson shall not have attained his majority the whole of my estate shall remain undivided." It was held that the period of distribution was the death of the testator; and if all four persons survived the testator they took vested interests from that date, but that the estate was not divisible until the grandson attained majority.

In the second illustration, the period of division is the death of the life tenant A.[1042]

1039. Cripps v Wolcott, (1819) ILR 4 Mad 11, p 15; Neathway v Reed, [1853] 3 De GM & G 18; Heani v Baker, [1864] 2 K & J 383; Re Gregson's Trust Estate [1864] 2 De GJ & Sm 428.

1041. Ellokassee Dassee v Durponarai, (1880) ILR 5 Cal 59.
1042. Cripps v Wolcott, (1819) ILR 4 Mad 11.

The third illustration is of the "contrary intention" for although there is a prior interest, the time of distribution is the death of the testator.

The fourth illustration is another instance of "contrary intention," for the time of distribution is that of one legatee surviving the other. In the passage already quoted from the judgment in White v Baker,[1043] the Lordship continued:

> But where, as in the present case, the bequest is to A for life and after his death to B and C, and in case either of them dies in the lifetime of A, the whole to the survivor, it is plain that the words in their natural import refer to one surviving the other.

25. Conditional transfer.—An interest created on a transfer of property and dependent upon a condition fails if the fulfilment of the condition is impossible, or is forbidden by law, or is of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of any law, or is fraudulent, or involves or implies injury to the person or property of another, or the Court regards it as immoral or opposed to public policy.

Synopsis

(1) Void Condition Precedent..... 184 (2) Indian Succession Act, 1925..... 185

(1) Void Condition Precedent

The expression "dependent upon a condition" shows that the section refers to conditions precedent. If the condition precedent to a transfer is of the nature described in this section, the transfer fails. Under section 6(h)(2) of TP Act, no transfer can be made for an object or consideration which is unlawful within the meaning of section 23 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.

A condition the fulfilment of which is impossible may refer to an act which is impossible in itself, as in the first two illustrations. The conditions, the fulfilment of which becomes impossible by the act of the party benefited by the non-fulfilment is dealt with in section 34.

The conditions referred to in this section are conditions which as agreements would be void.

Void conditions subsequent are the subject of section 32. If a condition subsequent is void, the condition fails, but the interest created by the transfer is not affected; while if a condition precedent is void, the transfer fails. A makes a gift of his field to B on condition that he sets fire to C's haystack. This is a void condition precedent, and the gift fails. A makes a gift of his field to B with a proviso that if he does not within a year's time set fire to C's haystack the gift shall be void. This is a void condition subsequent. The gift is a good gift, and is not affected by the void condition.

1043. White v Baker, [1860] 2 De GF & J 55, p 64; see also Scurheld v Howes, [1790] 3 Bro CC 90.

A gift to which an immoral condition is attached is a good gift, but the condition is void;[1044] but a transfer in consideration of future immoral relations is void.[1045]

Illustration (d) to the section recalls the case of Wilkinson v Wilkinson[1046] where it was held that a gift on a condition that a woman should cease to live with her husband is void, as the condition is void as against public policy. In a Bombay case,[1047] N advanced money to V, a married woman, to enable her to divorce her husband and marry N. He then sued to recover the advances. The court held that the agreement was against public policy and void.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925

The section corresponds to sections 126 and 127 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. A condition in partial restraint of marriage is valid in English law,[1048] and this would apparently be so under the Indian Succession Act, 1925.[1049] A condition in a will that the testator's sons daughter should not take any interest under the will, if she married before the death of the son, was upheld by the Calcutta High Court as not being intended to penalise her marriage, but as being a reasonable disposition having regard to the son's duty to see to his daughter's marriage during his life time.[1050] A condition precedent involving a breach of public duty,[1051] or in restraint of trade,[1052] invalidates a bequest.

An instance of an impossible condition is the case of Rajendra Lal v Mrinalini Dasi.[1053] The testator left a legacy on condition that the legatee should excavate a tank, but as he had himself excavated the tank before his death the bequest failed. Justice Mookerjee said that the performance of the condition was the motive of the bequest, and the impracticability of performance barred the claim of the legatee.

26. Fulfilment of condition precedent.—Where the terms of a transfer of property impose a condition to be fulfilled before a person can take an interest in the property, the condition shall be deemed to have been fulfilled if it has been substantially complied with.

(1) Performance of Condition Precedent

The law favours the early vesting of estates,[1054] and so a condition precedent may be carried out cy pres, and is fulfilled if it is substantially carried out. A contract stipulating the fulfilment of a condition precedent may be a contingent contract under section 26.[1055] For the same reason, section 29 enacts that a condition subsequent must be strictly fulfilled in order to prevent the divesting of an estate which was vested. This is well illustrated by a comparison of illustration (a) to this section with illustration (1) to section 132 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, where the same illustration is put in the form of a condition subsequent thus:

> A legacy is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if he marries without the consent of B, C and D, the legacy shall go to E. D dies. Even if A marries without the consent of B and C, the gift to E does not take effect.

The condition in the above illustration, being a condition subsequent, is strictly construed to prevent the legacy to A being divested; so on the death of D, the condition becomes impossible and void. Therefore, A may neglect it and marry without the consent of B and C. If it were so construed in the illustration (a) to section 26 where it is a condition precedent, A would take nothing, for performance of the condition would be impossible. Therefore, the condition is treated as fulfilled by substantial compliance and the transfer to A takes effect, if he marries with the consent of the survivors B and C.

Illustration (a) recalls the case of Dawson v Oliver-Massey,[1056] where the condition was marriage with the consent of parents, and the consent of a surviving parent was held to suffice.

Illustration (b) shows that if the condition is clear it cannot be evaded. Where the condition was marriage with the consent of guardians, and the sole guardian appointed by the will had died, and no guardian was appointed, the condition was not complied with, for the court could have on application appointed a guardian.[1057]

A condition of residence is valid,[1058] and when no manner of residence is prescribed, is complied with by occasional residence.[1059] In an Allahabad case,[1060] a dispute as to succession between a Mohammedan mother and cousins was compromised on terms that the mother should have an estate for life with power of alienation with the consent of the cousins who were to be the reversionary heirs. After the death of two cousins, the mother effected an alienation with the consent of the survivor. The judges differed as to whether this was a substantial compliance within the meaning of this section. It is submitted, however, that this was not a case of a condition precedent to the vesting of an estate, but merely a condition affecting the mother's authority to alienate, and the section had no application.

(vii) A legacy is bequeathed to A if he executed a certain document within a time specified in the will. The document is executed by A within a reasonable time, but not within the time specified in the will. A has not performed the condition, and is not entitled to receive the legacy.

Illustrations (ii) and (v) are the same as those in section 26 of the TP Act. Illustration (vii), like illustration (v) shows that if the condition is clear it is not to be evaded. In a case decided by the Privy Council, a legacy was bequeathed on condition that the legatee should "humbly apply for subsistence". However, as the legatee claimed as of right maintenance suitable to his rank and position, it was held that there was no substantial compliance with the condition and that the legacy failed.[1061]

27. Conditional transfer to one person coupled with transfer to another on failure of prior disposition.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created in favour of one person, and by the same transaction an ulterior disposition of the same interest is made in favour of another, if the prior disposition under the transfer shall fail, the ulterior disposition shall take effect upon the failure of the prior disposition, although the failure may not have occurred in the manner contemplated by the transferor.

But, where the intention of the parties to the transaction is that the ulterior disposition shall take effect only in the event of the prior disposition failing in a particular manner, the ulterior disposition shall not take effect unless the prior disposition fails in that manner.

(1) Shall fail

These words are important for they indicate that the prior interest is valid, and fails subsequently by reason of the valid condition not being fulfilled. If the prior interest is invalid under section 13 or section 14, the subsequent interest fails also under section 16. If the prior interest is invalid under section 25, the subsequent interest fails also under that section or under the combined effect of section 25 and section 28. This has been explained and illustrated in note (3) under section 16.

(2) Acceleration

In other cases, i.e., where the prior interest is valid and fails as the valid condition on which it rests has not been fulfilled,[1062] this section is applicable. The law favouring the vesting of estates says that the subsequent interest takes effect as if the prior interest has never been in the way. This results in an acceleration of the subsequent interest. In Jull v Jacobs,[1063] there was a bequest to A for life and then to his children. The gift to A failed as he had attested the will; but VC Malins held that the life estate being out of the way, the gift to the children took effect. This case was followed by the Privy Council in a case where there was a bequest to a wife for life, and then to her children.[1064] The gift of the wife failed under a local Act for want of registration, but the effect was to accelerate the gift of the children. In Eavestaff v Austin,[1065] Lord Romilly decided that the rule applied not only to reality, but to personality. The principle of the section was applied in the following case which occurred in Oudh.[1066] In that case, the right to manage a Hindu religious endowment was declared by an award to be vested for successive periods of 21 years, first in D, then in R, then in S, then in D's eldest son, then in R's eldest son, and then in S's eldest son. R and S both died in the second period of 21 years which belonged to R. The court held that the turn of management of D's eldest son was accelerated.

The rule has been justified on the ground that it gives effect to the intention of the grantor. In Lainson v Lainson[1067] Lord Romily said—

> Although the expression used was that the estate to the son of John Lainson is only to take effect from and after John Lainson's decease, I am of opinion that the meaning is "from and after the determination of his estate by death or otherwise". In deciding thus I fulfil the intention of the testator.

A failure of a prior gift does not accelerate a subsequent transfer not taking effect on the determination of the prior interest; thus a subsequent gift cannot be accelerated, where the persons who are to take under it are only ascertainable at a future date. It also cannot take effect unless two gifts are dependent on each other.[1068]

(3) Exception

The second clause refers to the exceptional case where the intention has been expressed that the gift over shall not take the effect, unless the prior gift fails in the particular manner stated.

(4) Indian Succession Act

The rule of acceleration is enacted in section 129 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. Two illustrations are annexed, one of which is the same as illustration (a) to section 27 of the TP Act, and the other is as follows:

> A bequeaths a sum of money to his own children surviving him, and if they all die under 18, to B. A dies without having even had a child. The bequest to B takes effect.

The exception to the rule of acceleration is enacted in section 130 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The section has one illustration which is the same as illustration (b) to section 27 of the TP Act. An instance of the exception is the case of Official Assignee of Madras v Thayarammal.[1069] In that case, the testator wished to disinherit his son, and left his property to any grandson or grandsons who might be born in his lifetime or within ten years of his death, and "if there shall be no such grandsons to be born as aforesaid" the whole estate to his granddaughters. A grandson was born within ten years of his death, but the gift to the grandson failed not only under the rule in the Tagore case, but also because the estate could not be left in suspense. The question then arose whether the gift having failed in a different manner from that contemplated, the granddaughters could take. It was held that they could not, because the testator's intention was that they should not take if there was a grandson in existence.

(5) Indian Cases

The following are some Indian instances of the rule:

(1) The testator's wife was enceinte and the testator left his property to the expected son and made a provision for the maintenance of the daughter should the expected child prove to be a daughter. There was a gift over in case the son died before attaining majority. On the birth of a daughter, the court held that the gift over took effect, although the failure of the gift to the son not in the manner contemplated by the testator.[1070]

(2) The testator made a gift to a son to be adopted by his wife and, in case of his death without issue, to his daughters. The power of adoption to be invalid, but although the prior bequest failed the gift over to the daughters took effect.[1071]

(3) A made a bequest to a minor son, and on his death before attaining majority to the widow for life, and then to the daughters. It was held that the daughters were not deprived of this legacy by the death of the widow before the minor son.[1072]

1072. Durga Pershad v Raghunandan Lal, (1915) 19 Cal WN 439 : 23 IC 597.

A case decided by Bombay High Court may perhaps be cited here, although it was not decided under the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The bequest was to the widow W for life, and on her death, to the daughter D's sons, but in case D had no sons, then to D for life, and on her death to the testator's cousin. W died in April 1907 and D had a son born in December 1907. The son could not take under Hindu law as he was not in existence at the death of the testator. The court said that although the intention of the testator to give his property to his daughter's son's son was defeated, yet as his next intention was to keep the property in the family, the gift over to the cousin took effect.[1073]

28. Ulterior transfer conditional on happening or not happening of specified event.—On a transfer of property an interest therein may be created to accrue to any person with the condition superadded that in case a specified uncertain event shall happen such interest shall pass to another person, or that in case a specified uncertain event shall not happen such interest shall pass to another person. In each case the dispositions are subject to the rules contained in sections 10, 12, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25 and 27.

(1) Conditional Limitation

The ulterior transfer, as it is called in the marginal note to this section, or ulterior disposition, as it is called in sections 27, 29 and 30, is effected by a conditional limitation. A conditional limitation, is one containing a condition which divests an estate that has vested and vests it in another person. As regards the prior interest, it is a condition subsequent, but as regards the ulterior interest, it is a condition precedent.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A settled property on his second wife for her life, and then on her son if she should have a son; but if she should not have a son, then on the sons by his first wife. The Privy Council held that the sons by the first wife took a vested interest liable to be divested by the birth of a son to the second wife.[1074]

(2) The terms of a compromise provided that L should have an estate for life, and after her death, R should be full owner if he survived L, and if he did not, the estate would pass to R's, lineal male descendent according to the rule of primogenitur. The court held that the condition affected the retention of the estate and not in acquisition, and construed the compromise as conferring on R a vested interest liable to be divested if he did not survive L.[1075]

(2) Specified Sections

The ulterior transfer or conditional limitation, is subject to the rules contained in the sections specified in this section. The application of these sections is best explained by following illustrations:

section 10— A transfers his field to B without power of alienation and in case of B's death without issue, to C also without power of alienation. The restriction is void in both cases.

section 12— A transfers his field to B, and if B becomes insolvent, to C. B becomes insolvent. The field vests not in C but in the Official Receiver of the Official Assignee as the case may be.

section 21— A transfers his field to B, and in case of B's death without issue, to C. C has a contingent interest which becomes vested on B's death without issue.

section 22— A transfers his field to B and on B's death to such of the children of C as shall attain the age of 18. All the children of C who are alive at B's death have an interest, which vests when they attain the age of 18.

section 23— A transfers his field to B for life and then to C, if C goes to England. C does not go to England until a year after B's death. C's interest fails.

section 24— A transfers his field to B and on B's death without issue to the sons of C or the survivor of them. The sons of C who survive B take the field.

section 25— A transfers his field to B on condition that he murders C with a proviso that on B's death without issue the field shall belong to D. The interest both of B and of D fails.

(3) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, is section 131. The following illustrations are annexed to the section:

(i) A sum of money is bequeathed to A, to be paid to him at the age of 18 and if he shall die before he attains that age, to B. A takes a vested interest in the legacy, subject to be divested and to go to B in case A dies under 18.

(ii) An estate is bequeathed to A with the proviso that if A shall dispute the competency of the testator to make a will, the estate shall go to B. A disputes the competency of the testator to make a will. The estate goes to B.

(iii) A sum of money is bequeathed to A for life, and after his death to B but if B shall then be dead, leaving a son, such son is to stand in the place of B. B takes a vested interest in the legacy, subject to be divested if he dies leaving a son in A's life-time.

(iv) A sum of money is bequeathed to A and B, and if either should die during the life of C, then to the survivor living at the death of C. A and B die before C. The gift over cannot take effect, but the representative of A takes one-half of the money, and the representative of B takes the other half.

(v) A bequeaths to B the interest of a fund for life, and directs the fund to be divided at her death equally among her three children, or such of them as shall be living at her death. All the children of B die in B's lifetime. The bequest over cannot take effect, but the interests of the children pass to their representatives.

In the reported cases, divesting conditions in wills have generally been on account of death without issue,[1076] or non-residence.[1077] In Gooroo Das v Sarat Chunder[1078] there was a gift for life to the widow and then an absolute estate of inheritance to the brothers liable to be divested, if the widow adopted a son; it was held to be a valid conditional limitation.

In Bachman v Bachman,[1079] the testator directed his trustees and executors to sell his estate and divide the proceeds between the legatees in certain proportions, but that if any legatee should die in his lifetime or before the division leaving lawful issue, such issue should be entitled to the share his deceased parent would have taken. One legatee died five months after the testator, but before the division had been made, leaving lawful issue. The court held that this legatee took a vested interest which was divested by his death before the division and the gift over to the legatee's issue took effect. The court followed the decision in Johnson v Crook.[1080] However, the authority of Johnson's case is very doubtful, for the House of Lords in Minors v Battison[1081] seem to have held that a divesting condition which depends upon the dilatoriness or caprice of a trustee, is void.[1082]

In a Madras case,[1083] there was a curious proviso which was held not to operate as a condition of defeasance. The bequest was to a daughter for life and then to her children, and if the daughter should die "leaving no child living at her death" such property "as shall not have become vested" was to go to the testator's son. The daughter had only one child, a son who predeceased her. The son's interest was vested, but it was not divested because the condition subsequent did not on the terms of the will apply to an interest which was vested.

(4) Repugnancy

A conditional limitation is a condition of defeasance, which terminates the interest of one person and invests another person with it. However, if an estate is given to a named donee in terms which confer an absolute estate, and then a further interest is given merely after or on termination of that donee's interest, and not in defeasance of it; the further interest will be void for repugnancy. Thus, when a testator gave an absolute estate to his wife with power of alienation, and then added a clause that "if, at the time of the death of my widow, there be no adopted son or if no son or wife of the adopted son be alive, then, my heir according to the Hindu shastras who shall be alive at the time shall get the properties which shall remain after disposal by my wife by way of gift or sale of the same"—the gift over was invalid.[1084] Similarly, in Anandrao Vinayak v Administrator General of Bombay,[1085] the testator made an absolute gift to his son G, and then added "and when the sons of my son G shall attain the age of twenty-one years, the same shall be divided and duly received by G and his sons in equal shares." The gift to the grandsons was void for repugnancy, and the absolute estate of G was not divested. In a Bombay case,[1086] however, where the testator gave an absolute estate to R and then added "should R die and should he then leave a son, such his son shall afterwards be the owner"—it was held that R took only a life-estate.

(5) Hindu Law

The section applies to Hindus, and conditional limitations or grants subject to defeasance with a gift over have always been recognised in Hindu law.

(6) Mahomedan Law

A gift cannot be made so as to take effect on the happening of a contingency. It follows that, conditional limitations are not recognised in Mahomedan law.

29. Fulfilment of condition subsequent.—An ulterior disposition of the kind contemplated by the last preceding section cannot, take effect unless the condition is strictly fulfilled.

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers ₹500 to B, to be paid to him on his attaining his majority or marrying, with a proviso that, if B dies as minor or marries without C's consent, the ₹500 shall go to D. B marries when only 17 years of age, without C's consent. The transfer of D takes effect.

Synopsis

(1) Performance of a Condition Subsequent 193
(2) Indian Succession Act 194

(1) Performance of a Condition Subsequent

It follows from the principle that the law favours the vesting of estates, that a condition subsequent, which has the effect of divesting an estate is subject to the rule of strict construction, and that a condition precedent to an estate vesting is deemed to have been fulfilled, if it is substantially complied with. This has been explained in note (1) under section 26 where illustration (a) to section 26 has been contrasted with illustration (i) to section 132 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925.

If the interest has become vested, it is not to be taken away except by clear words.[1087] In a case where a Hindu widow was authorised to adopt a son, with a direction that if the first adopted son died before the age of 20, she was to adopt another son to take the place of the deceased adopted son, the Calcutta High Court said that a clause of defeasance in order to be operative, must contain express words or words necessary implication of a gift over to a definite person or persons.[1088] The implication of a gift over to the second adopted son was not sufficient to prevent the widow of the first adopted son from inheriting her husband's share.[1089]

Where the words of the condition are clear, they must be clearly fulfilled. If there is any ambiguity in the condition subsequent, it will be read in the sense most favourable to the vested interest. Accordingly, a gift to A for life and then to his children with a gift over in the event of A's death without leaving children, is construed as a gift over in the event of A's death without having had a child.[1090]

Ignorance of a condition is no excuse for non-compliance,[1091] for a person who takes under an instrument, cannot plead want of knowledge of its contents.[1092] Similarly, a condition

(2) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, is section 132. The third illustration to that section is the same as that to section 29 of the TP Act.

The other illustrations are as follows:

(i) A legacy is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if he marries without the consent of B, C and D, the legacy will go to E. D dies. Even if A marries without the consent of B and C, the gift to E does not take effect.

(ii) A legacy is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if he marries without the consent of B, the legacy shall go to C. A marries with the consent of B. He afterwards becomes a widower and marries again without the consent of B. The bequest to C does not take effect.

Illustration (i) imports the same condition as illustration (a) to section 26 of the TP Act, or illustration (ii) to section 128 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, but as it is here a condition subsequent, it is subject to strict construction, and is discharged by the death of one of the parties whose consent is required. In the second illustration, the condition once fulfilled is discharged.

30. Prior disposition not affected by invalidity of ulterior disposition.— If the ulterior disposition is not valid, the prior disposition is not affected by it.

(1) Subsequent Interest Invalid

When a prior interest is invalid either as offending against the rule against perpetuity, or as being illegal or impossible under section 25, the subsequent interest also fails. This has been explained in the note (2) under section 16. However, if the subsequent interest is invalid, then the prior interest is not affected.

(1) A transfers his field to B with a proviso that on the death of B's last lineal male descendant the field shall belong to the lineal descendant of C. The ulterior disposition to C is invalid under the rule against perpetuity, but the estate of B is not affected.

(2) A transfers his field to B with a proviso that if R does not within a year set fire to C's haystack, the field shall belong to D. The ulterior disposition to D is invalid under section 25, but the interest of B is not affected.

In Saraju Bala v Jyotirmoyee,[1094] there was a gift of an absolute estate to a daughter, with a defeasance clause whereby the property was to revert to the heirs of the grantor in case of the failure of her descendants. The Privy Council held that as the defeasance clause was void, the Re Beard, Reversionary & General Securities Ltd v Hall,[1095] there was a devise with a condition of defeasance in case the devisee entered the naval or military forces of the Crown, but as the condition was void as opposed to public policy, the devisee took an absolute interest.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925

The same rule is enacted in section 133 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. Three illustrations are annexed to the section of which the second is the same as that in this section. The other two illustrations are as follows:

> (i) An estate is bequeathed to A for his life with condition superadded that, if he shall not on a given day walk 100 miles in an hour, the estate shall go to B. The condition being void. A retains his estate as if no condition had been inserted in the will.
> (ii) An estate is bequeathed to A for life, and, if he marries, to the eldest son of B for life. B, at the date of the testator's death, had not had a son. The bequest over is void under section 105, and A is entitled to the estate during his life.

In Bai Dhanlaxmi v Hari Prasad,[1096] there was an absolute bequest to the eldest son with a superadded condition of defeasance in case of failure of male issue, and an attempt to create an estate of inheritance not known to Hindu law. The court held that the original bequest to the son was not affected by the failure of the gift over. In Narsingh Rao v Mahalakshmi,[1097] the settlor, whose son was in prison, made a gift in 1875 of his property to his widow with a condition of defeasance in case his son should have a son within 16 years, in which case the property was to go to the grandson. The condition was void under Hindu law as it then was, being in favour of an unborn person, and the widow took an absolute and indefeasible estate. The Privy Council said that:

> it is a well settled principle of law, which has now been embodied in sections 28 and 30 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, that in such a case if the ulterior disposition is not valid, the prior disposition is not affected by it.

(3) Hindu Law

The section now applies to Hindus, and the section of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 applies to wills governed by the Hindu Wills Act. However, the principle of the sections has always been applied to Hindus. Thus, in Tagore v Tagore,[1098] where there was a gift to A for life, and after him to his heirs in tail male, the subsequent disposition was invalid, but A's life-estate was not affected. Similarly, in Khetter Mohan Mullick v Gunga Narain,[1099] it was held that specific trusts of specific estates good in themselves were not invalidated by a subsequent illegal disposition of the remainder. The case of Saraju Bala v Jyotirmoyee,[1100] referred to in note (1) was decided under Hindu law.

Synopsis

(1) Condition Subsequent..... 196
(2) Condition Subsequent a Penalty..... 197
(3) Indian Succession Act, 1925..... 197

(1) Condition Subsequent

The condition referred to in this section is a condition subsequent which terminates an interest and revests it in the grantor. It is not a conditional limitation, which creates an interest in a third person. The next section requires that the condition subsequent should be valid, otherwise it will not have the effect of terminating the interest to which it is attached. As the section is subject to section 12, it follows that a condition subsequent divesting an estate on the ground of insolvency or of attempted alienation would be void.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A is under sentence of transportation for life and transfers his field to B with a proviso that in case he returns from Port Blair, B's interest shall cease. A returns from Port Blair. B's interest in the field ceases.[1101]

(2) A transfers his field to B with proviso that if B becomes insolvent, B's interest in the field shall cease. B is adjudged insolvent. The field vests in the Official Receiver or the Official Assignee as the case may be.

A condition subsequent requiring residence in a particular house has been held to be valid.[1102] A condition requiring residence in a holy place was not broken when the devisee was forcibly detained in another place.[1103] A gift which is revocable under section 126 is an instance of a transfer subject to a condition subsequent.[1104]

This section applies only to a completed transfer of property creating an interest therein with a condition superadded for its cessor on a certain contingency, but has no application to a contract for transfer with a condition superadded thereto. Thus, where in a sale deed it was provided that if the vendee did not pay the amount of the price retained by him to the creditor of the vendor within a certain time, the sale deed would be deemed to have been cancelled, and the vendee failed to pay the price to the creditor within time and the court gave him further time to pay, it was held that the contract of sale and the act of transfer were embodied in the same deed, and the condition was to be regarded as an integral condition of the contract for sale providing the date for completion of the contract by satisfaction of the balance of the contract price, and not as a condition superadded to the transfer itself, and, therefore, the transfer was not defeated. It was held that there was nothing in section 31, which merely declared that a limitation upon a condition subsequent is a lawful method of grant, to exclude the right of the court to give relief to the vendee who failed to make payment of the price by the date agreed upon in the contract of sale.[1105] In a case before the Orissa High Court,[1106] the court was considering a lease to the defendants for the manufacture of salt which provided, inter alia, that the lease stood cancelled if the lessee did "any other business or manufacture of any other kind" on the land. The lessee used the lands for fishing, and the lessor purported to cancel the lease. The court held, relying on the illustrations to section 31, that:

> a specified event contemplated under section 31 must be definite and specific and a wide and vague clause of the nature of "any other business" cannot be taken to be a specified event... . We may be inclined to agree if the condition was of the nature that if the lessee carry on business in fish or business in timber, it may come within the operation of the provisions of section 31. But the provisions of the lease being to the effect that if the lessees carry on any other business or manufacture, it cannot be taken to be a specified event[1107] is Sed quaere, for the section does not prescribe a specific event, but merely specified events, i.e., the section requires that the uncertain event should be definitely and fully set out. In any event, it is difficult to see how the wide, but definite negative concept "any other business" is less specific than the positive examples mentioned.

(2) Condition Subsequent a Penalty

It has been held that if a condition subsequent involving forfeiture of an estate is in the nature of a penalty, it may be relieved against, and pecuniary compensation may be awarded for non-performance.[1108]

(3) Indian Succession Act, 1925

This section corresponds to section 134 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. Five illustrations are annexed to the section in the Indian Succession Act, 1925, of which the first and third are the same as those in this section. The others are:

> (ii) An estate is bequeathed to A, provided that, if he marries under the age of 25 without the consent of the executors named in the will, the estate shall cease to belong to him. A marries under 25 without the consent of the executors. The estate ceases to belong to him.
> (iv) An estate is bequeathed to A, with a proviso that, if she becomes a nun, she shall cease to have any interest in the estate. A becomes a nun. She loses her interest under the will.
> (v) A fund is bequeathed to A for life, after his death, to B, if B shall then be living, with a proviso that, if B shall become a nun, the bequest to her shall cease to have any effect. B becomes a nun in the life-time of A. She thereby loses her contingent interest in the fund.

32. Such condition must not be invalid.—In order that a condition that an interest shall cease to exist may be valid, it is necessary that the event to which it relates be one which could legally constitute the condition of the creation of an interest.

(1) Invalid Condition

If the condition is invalid, it cannot be set up as a condition precedent for crystallisation of the interest created.[1109] This section is analogous to section 30. Under section 30, an invalid ulterior disposition will not affect a prior interest; and so under this section, an invalid condition subsequent will not divest the interest to which it is attached. A condition which is void as a condition precedent is also void as a condition subsequent.

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers his field to B with a proviso that if B does not within a year set fire to C's haystack his interest shall cease. The condition subsequent is invalid and B's interest is not affected.

Instances of conditions subsequently void as contrary to public policy, are a condition divesting the interest of a devisee if he enters the naval or military forces of his country;[1110] or a condition requiring the donee to obtain a title.[1111]

A condition that a person shall not become a Christian is valid.[1112]

(2) Indian Succession Act

The corresponding section of the Indian Succession Act is section 135 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. If the condition is invalid, failure to comply with it does not involve forfeiture. Where a testator bequeathed an annuity to his wife which would, according to the terms of the will, be forfeited if she did not live in the family house which he intended to build, but died without building, the condition was void for impossibility and the widow was held to be entitled to the annuity, although she lived in her father's house.[1113]

33. Transfer conditional on performance of act, no time being specified for performance.—Where, on a transfer of property, an interest therein is created subject to a condition that the person taking it shall perform a certain act, but no time is specified for the performance of the act, the condition is broken when he renders impossible, permanently or for an indefinite period, the performance of the act.

Synopsis

(1) Time for Performance..... 198 (2) Indian Succession Act, 1925..... 198

(1) Time for Performance

When no time is fixed for the performance of a condition subsequent, it is broken not only when the person does an act which renders performance impossible, but also when he does an act by which performance is indefinitely postponed. This is explained by the second illustration to section 136 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, set out in the next paragraph.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925

The corresponding provision is section 136 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The following illustrations are annexed to the section:

(i) A bequest is made to A, with a proviso that, unless he enters the Army, the legacy shall go over to B. A takes Holy Orders, and thereby renders it impossible that he should fulfil the condition. B is entitled to receive the legacy.

(ii) A bequest is made to A, with a proviso that it shall cease to have any effect if he does not marry B's daughter. A marries a stranger and thereby indefinitely postpones the fulfilment of the conditions. The bequest ceases to have effect.

The second illustration corresponds to the illustration to section 34 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.

A testator bequeathed his property to his daughter's son, in the event of his widow dying without adopting a son, but the interest was conditional on the daughter's son residing in the family house. The daughter's son joined the widow in selling the house. This was a breach of the condition, and he was deprived of the interest given by the will.[1114]

34. Transfer conditional on performance of act, time being specified.—Where an act is to be performed by a person either as a condition to be fulfilled before an interest created on a transfer of property is enjoyed by him, or as a condition on the non-fulfilment of which the interest is to pass from him to another person, and a time is specified for the performance of the act, if such performance within the specified time is prevented by the fraud of a person who would be directly benefited by non-fulfilment of the condition, such further time shall as against him be allowed for performing the act as shall be requisite to make up for the delay caused by such fraud. But if no time is specified for the performance of the act, then, if its performance is by the fraud of a person interested in the non-fulfilment of the condition rendered impossible or indefinitely postponed, the condition shall as against him be deemed to have been fulfilled.

Synopsis

(1) Principle..... 199 (2) Indian Succession Act, 1925..... 199

(1) Principle

The principle underlying this section is that no party can take advantage of his own fraud. If performance of a condition, whether subsequent or precedent, is prevented by a person interested in its non-fulfilment, the delay is excused, and the condition is discharged.

(2) Indian Succession Act, 1925

In a case decided by Calcutta High Court,[1115] the testator directed that if any of the female members of his family lived for more than three months at any place other than a holy place, they would forfeit their interest under his will. The forfeiture was not incurred when they were forcibly removed by their relations.

ELECTION

35. Election when necessary.—Where a person professes to transfer property which he has no right to transfer, and as part of the same transaction confers any benefit on the owner of the property, such owner must elect either to confirm such transfer or to dissent from it; and in the latter case he shall relinquish the benefit so conferred, and the benefit so relinquished shall revert to the transferor or his representative as if it had not been disposed of,

subject, nevertheless, where the transfer is gratuitous, and the transferor has, before the election, died or otherwise become incapable of making a fresh transfer, and in all cases where the transfer is for consideration, to the charge of making good to the disappointed transferee the amount or value of the property attempted to be transferred to him.

ILLUSTRATIONS

The farm of Sultanpur is the property of C and worth ₹800. A by an instrument of gift professes to transfer it to B, giving by the same instrument ₹1,000 to C. C elects to retain the farm. He forfeits the gift of ₹1,000.

In the same case, A dies before the election. His representative must out of the ₹1,000 pay ₹800 to B.

The rule in the first paragraph of this section applies whether the transferor does or does not believe that which he professes the transfer to be his own.

A person taking no benefit directly under a transaction, but deriving a benefit under it indirectly, need not elect.

A person who in one capacity takes a benefit under the transaction may in another dissent therefrom.

Exception to the last preceding four rules.—Where a particular benefit is expressed to be conferred on the owner of the property which the transferor professes to transfer, and such benefit is expressed to be in lieu of that property, if such owner claims the property, he must relinquish the particular benefit, but he is not bound to relinquish any other benefit conferred upon him by the same transaction.

Acceptance of the benefit by the person on whom it is conferred constitutes an election by him to confirm the transfer, if he is aware of his duty to elect and of those circumstances which would influence the judgment of a reasonable man in making an election, or if he waives inquiry into the circumstances.

Such knowledge or waiver shall, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be presumed, if the person on whom the benefit has been conferred has enjoyed it for two years without doing any act to express dissent.

Such knowledge or waiver may be inferred from any act of his which renders it impossible to place the persons interested in the property professed to be transferred in the same condition as if such act had not been done.

ILLUSTRATION

A transfers to B an estate to which C is entitled, and as part of the same transaction gives C a coal-mine. C takes possession of the mine and exhausts it. He has thereby confirmed the transfer of the estate to B.

If he does not within one year after the date of the transfer signify to the transferor or his representatives his intention to confirm or to dissent from the transfer, the transferor or his representatives may, upon the expiration of that period, require him to make his election; and if he does not comply with such requisition within a reasonable time after he has received it, he shall be deemed to have elected to confirm the transfer.

In case of disability, the election shall be postponed until the disability ceases, or until the election is made by some competent authority.

(1) Election

The foundation of the doctrine of election is that a person taking the benefit of an instrument must also bear the burden,[1116] and that he cannot take under and against the same instrument.[1117] It is, therefore, a branch of the general rule that no one may approbate and reprobate.[1118] However, there must be a will or a deed which conveys title to a person in properties other than those belonging to himself, before he can be put to election. A surrender by a Hindu widow to her immediate reversioner does not amount to such conveyance, for on a surrender taking place the widow, by a legal fiction is assumed as dead and the reversioner takes the estate as the heir of the last full owner, and not as a transferee from the widow.[1119]

The doctrine is based on intention to this extent that the law presumes that the author of an instrument intended to give effect to every part of it.[1120]

The rule of election as applied to wills is enacted in sections 180 to 190 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The following illustrations under section 182 are instances of election:

(i) The farm of Sultanpur was the property of C. A bequeathed it to B, giving a legacy of 1,000 rupees to C. C has elected to retain his farm of Sultanpur, which is worth 800 rupees. C forfeits his legacy of 1,000 rupees, of which 800 rupees goes to B, and the remaining 200 rupees falls into the residuary bequest, or devolves according to the rules of intestate succession, as the case may be.

(ii) A bequeaths an estate to B in case B's elder brother (who is married and has children) shall leave no issue living at his death. A also bequeaths to C a jewel, which belongs to B. B must elect to give up the jewel or to lose the estate.

(iii) A bequeaths to B 1,000 rupees, and to C an estate which will, under a settlement, belong to B if his elder brother (who is married and has children) shall leave no issue living at his death. B must elect to give up the estate or to lose the legacy.

(iv) A, a person of the age of 18, domiciled in British India but owning real property in England, to which C is heir at law, bequeaths a legacy to C and, subject thereto, devises and bequeaths to B "all my property whatsoever and wheresoever," and dies under 21. The real property in England does not pass by the will. C may claim his legacy without giving up the real property in England.

The first illustration is almost identical with a Madras case,[1121] in which the testator bequeathed a field which belonged to his niece, to his grandson, and at the same time left his niece a legacy of ₹800. The court held that she must elect between the land or the legacy. The second and third illustrations show that the principle applies to all interests whether vested or contingent, immediate or remote.[1122]

(3) Proprietary Interest

A person is not put to his election, unless he has a proprietary interest in the property disposed of in derogation of his rights.[1123] A creditor is not put to his election, for he has only a personal claim for payment by his debtor.[1124] A bequest in the will of a Hindu that "my elder brother V's self-acquisition to the extent of ₹10,000 is with me, so, that money should be given to him" was treated as a legacy in satisfaction of the debt, and V was not estopped from claiming it by the fact that he had tried and failed to recover the money as a debt.[1125] In another case, the testator disposed of his property in favour of his wife and daughter, and then gave away "my own and my wife's ornaments," but the court held that this did not raise a question of election as the stridhan ornaments in which his wife had a proprietary interest were not included in the bequest.[1126] If the property which the testator professes to dispose of does not belong to the other legatee, no question of election can of course, arise.[1127]

(4) Same Transaction

The equity of election does not apply, unless the two donations are part of the same transaction, for if the two are independent, the one which is in the power of the transferor will stand, while the other will fail. In Muhammad Afzal v Ghulam Kasim,[1128] government on the death of the Nawab of Tank, when transferring the chiefship to the eldest son, transferred a portion of the cash allowance of the late Nawab to the second son on whom the late Nawab had already made a grant of two villages for maintenance. The Privy Council said that the second son was not put to his election, as the two grants came from independent sources. In another case, a Hindu widow made a gift in excess of her powers and subsequently left a will in the following terms: "Excluding the properties which I have already given away, I will make the following dispositions". The Madras High Court held that the plaintiff taking under the will was not precluded by the doctrine of election from disputing the prior gift which was not the subject of the will at all.[1129]

Election may arise when the two donations are conferred by two different instruments, if the two instruments are used to carry out one transaction.[1130]

(5) Benefit

The doctrine can only apply if a benefit in the real sense is conferred by the instrument. Where by a will the testator purports to bequeath to his coparcener joint family property, such coparcener who would in any case have been entitled to such property, cannot be said to have derived any benefit under the will, and is not put to election.[1131]

(6) Doctrine of Election not Available to Cure an Illegality

The doctrine of election cannot be resorted to in order to cure an illegality, and a gift which infringes the rule against perpetuities cannot be used to raise a case for election. A purported release by a Muslim daughter, which was void under section 6(a), cannot be saved by the doctrine of election, for that would amount to curing a manifest illegality.[1132] Illustration (iv) to section 182 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, cited in note 2 above, appears to be based on the supposition that a devise by an infant would in English law be a breach of the law, but it may be doubted whether in English law it would be considered as more than a case of incapacity to dispose of the land, in which case the heir would be put to his election. Not only will the doctrine of election not cure an illegality, but as election is a doctrine of equity it will not be applied so as to lead to inequitable results.[1133]

(7) Revert to the Transferor

The doctrine in India rests on forfeiture, and the disappointed donee looks to the transferor to compensate him by a charge on the property that has reverted to him. There is no occasion for a charge if the transferor survives and the transfer is gratuitous, for it is open to the transferor to make a substituted gift.

(8) Belief of the Transferor

The second para corresponds to section 182 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. As already stated, the principle may refer to the implied intention of the testator, but it is not necessary that he should have had in mind the equitable principle of election.[1134] It does not matter whether the transferor thought he had the power to convey, or knowing the extent of his authority, intended by an arbitrary execution of power to exceed it.[1135] To quote the words of Lord Alvanley "nothing can be more dangerous than to speculate upon what he would have done, if he had known one thing or another".[1136] It is not, therefore, necessary that the author of the instrument should have known that the property did not belong to him or that he intended to put the donee to an election. However, this intention may be expressed, and then the condition is a condition precedent which must be literally performed. This is the case in the exception discussed in note (11) below.

(9) Indirect Benefit

The third para corresponds to section 184 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925 (section 171, Indian Succession Act, 1865).

The section is explained by the following illustration:

> The lands of Sultanpur are settled upon C for life, and after his death upon D, his only child. A bequeaths the lands of Sultanpur to B, and 1,000 rupees to C. C dies intestate shortly after the testator, and without having made any election. D takes out administration to C, and as administrator elects on behalf of C's estate to take under the will. In that capacity he receives the legacy of 1,000 rupees and accounts to B for the rents of the lands of Sultanpur which accrued after the death of the testator and before the death of C. In his individual character he retains the lands of Sultanpur in opposition to the will.

On the same principle, it has been held in England that a man may be tenant by courtesy of an estate tail held by his wife in opposition to a will under which he accepts a legacy.[1137] The interest which the husband takes in such a case is an incident of the property of his wife, and not a benefit conferred by the transferor so as to raise a case for election.

(10) Different Capacity

The fourth para corresponds with the first part of section 185 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, which is explained by the following illustration:

> The estate of Sultanpur is settled upon A for life, and after his death, upon B. A leaves the estate of Sultanpur to D, and 2,000 rupees to B, and 1,000 rupees to C, who is B's only child. B dies intestate, shortly after the testator, without having made an election. C takes out administration to B, and as administrator elects to keep the estate of Sultanpur in opposition to the will, and to relinquish the legacy of 2,000 rupees. C may do this, and yet claim the legacy of 1,000 rupees under the will.

An administrator or trustee may take a benefit qua administrator for the benefit of the estate, or of the beneficiary, and take a benefit for himself without being put to an election. No question of election can arise merely because owing to circumstances two capacities have merged in one person.[1138]

(11) Exception

The exception corresponds to the second part of section 186 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, where it is explained by the following illustration:

> Under A's marriage settlement, his wife is entitled, if she survives him, to the enjoyment of the estate of Sultanpur during her life. A, by his will bequeaths to his wife an annuity of 200 rupees during her life, in lieu other interest in the estate of Sultanpur, which estate he bequeaths to his son. He also gives his wife a legacy of 1,000 rupees. The widow elects to take what she is entitled to under the settlement. She is bound to relinquish the annuity but not the legacy of 1,000 rupees.

Section 172 of the Indian Succession Act, 1865, (corresponding to section 186 of the 1925 Act) was referred to in a Calcutta case,[1139] in which a testator bequeathed to his nephew all his property including the share of his brother's widow, and made a provision for the widow's maintenance. The widow recovered the maintenance allowance by suit, and it was held that a subsequent suit for her share of the property was barred by section 172, as she must have known that the allowance was given to her in lieu of other share of the property.

(12) Acceptance

The fifth para corresponds to section 187 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925, which is explained by the following illustrations:

> (i) A is the owner of an estate called Sultanpur Khurd, and has a life interest in another estate called Sultanpur Buzurg to which upon his death his son B will be absolutely entitled. The will of A gives the estate of Sultanpur Khurd to B, and the estate of Sultanpur Buzurg to C. B, in ignorance of his own right to the estate of Sultanpur Buzurg, allows C to take possession of it, and enters into possession of the estate of Sultanpur Khurd. B has not confirmed the bequest of Sultanpur Buzurg to C.
> (ii) B, the eldest son of A, is the possessor of an estate called Sultanpur, A bequeaths Sultanpur to C, and to B the residue of A's property. B having been informed by A's executors that the residue will amount to 5,000 rupees, allows C to take possession of Sultanpur. He afterwards discovers that the residue does not amount to more than 500 rupees. B has not confirmed the bequest of the estate of Sultanpur to C.

Acceptance of a benefit implies an election,[1140] but as in English law, there is no implied election except by a party who has full knowledge of the circumstances that would influence the judgment of a reasonable man making the election, and with that knowledge determines to elect.[1141] He waives the inquiry into the circumstances if he wilfully abstains from inquiring into them so that he is affected with constructive notice of them. An election made with full knowledge is final;[1142] but an election made without such knowledge may be revoked by the representatives of the electing party.[1143] Cases have arisen in India in connection with bequests to pardanashin women, and it has been held that it must be proved that they were fully aware of their rights when the acts were done which are said to constitute an election.[1144] In Sadik Husain v Hashim Ali,[1145] a Mahomedan executed a voluntary trust deed settling property on his wife in satisfaction of her claim for dower, and the Privy Council observed that "if she was never fully informed of its purport and contents, any election by her to accept the provision made for herself and her children by it in discharge of the unpaid balance of her dower would, of course, be of no avail."

(13) Two Years' Enjoyment

The sixth para corresponds to section 188(1) of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. The presumption may be rebutted. A widow who enjoyed a provision made for her under a will in ignorance of her right of dower was held entitled to elect after a lapse of 16 years.[1146] When the person who has to elect is in possession of both estates, no presumption can be drawn.[1147]

(14) Status Quo cannot be Restored

The seventh para corresponds with section 188(2) of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. It is sufficiently explained by the illustration to the exception. The section permits an inference of knowledge which may be rebutted by circumstances.

(15) Time for Election

The eighth para corresponds with section 189 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. If a time is fixed by the instrument, and the party makes default, he is deemed to have elected against the instrument.[1148]

(16) Disability

The ninth para corresponds with section 190 of the Indian Succession Act, 1925. A minor's election may be postponed until his majority, or his guardian may elect for him.

(17) Ratification

Cases of ratification must be distinguished from cases of election. For, ratification properly speaking, refers to acts done on behalf of the ratifier. If done without authority, the principal may elect either to ratify, or to disown them. This has been laid down in section 196 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872. The doctrine of ratification rests, however, on the same principle that a man cannot both affirm and disaffirm the same transaction. Thus, when a widow who had a life-estate for maintenance granted a permanent lease, the reversioner could elect either to ratify it, or to set it aside; and it was held that he was not bound by the lease when he accepted rent for three years in ignorance of the circumstances under which the lease was granted or the terms on which it was held.[1149] A converse case is Modhu Sudan v Rooke[1150] where the reversioner accepted rent with full knowledge that the widow had granted a patni lease, and he was held to have elected to ratify the lease.

(18) Hindu Law

The section now applies to Hindus, but the principle has always applied. In Rungama v Atchama,[1151] the Privy Council referred to the "principle not peculiar to English law, but common to all law which is based on the rules of justice, viz, the principle that a party shall not at the same time affirm and disaffirm the same transaction—affirm it as far as it is for his benefit and disaffirm it as far as it is to his prejudice."

In Shah Mukhun Lal v Sree Kishen Singh,[1152] the Privy Council said that the principle that you cannot both approbate and reprobate the same transaction was a "maxim founded, not so much on any positive law, as on the broad and universally applicable principles of justice". The doctrine was directly applied in the case of Mangaldas v Runchhoddas.[1153] A Hindu widow devised to K immovable property of her husband and gave the plaintiff, a reversionary heir, a legacy of ₹2000. The plaintiff claimed the legacy under the will and the immovable property as heir. The court said that the doctrine of election applied, and that he must elect to take the one or the other.

(19) Mahomedan Law

Apportionment

36. Apportionment of periodical payments on determination of interest of person entitled.—In the absence of a contract or local usage to the contrary, all rents, annuities, pensions, dividends and other periodical payments in the nature of income shall, upon the transfer of the interest of the person entitled to receive such payments, be deemed, as between the transferor and the transferee, to accrue due from day to day, and to be apportionable accordingly, but to be payable on the days appointed for the payment thereof.

(1) Apportionment by Time

This section refers to apportionment by time, while the whole of section 37 refers to apportionment by estate.

ILLUSTRATIONS

(1) A has let his house at a rent of ₹100 payable on the last day of each month. A sells the house to B on 15 June. On 30 June, A is entitled to ₹50 rent from the 1st to 15th and B is entitled to ₹50 rent from 15th to 30th June. This is apportionment by time.

(2) A has let his house at a rent of ₹100. A sells half the house to B. The tenant having notice of the sale must pay from the date of the sale, rent at the rate of ₹50 to A and ₹50 to B. This is apportionment by estate.

On a transfer of property yielding income, section 8 provides that the transferee is entitled to the interest or income accruing after the transfer takes effect. The interest has in such cases to be divided between the transferor and the transferee. There is no difficulty in respect of interest, for that accrues from day to day. But as to income which does not accrue de die in diem, the rule in section 8 might lead to anomalous results. For instance, rents do not accrue from day to day, but at stated periods,[1155] and if the rent for the year was payable the day after the transfer, the transferee would be entitled to the whole year's rent. To remove this anomaly, the section enacts that all periodical payments in the nature of rent, annuities, dividends and pensions shall be deemed to accrue from day to day, and be apportioned between the transferor and transferee on that basis.

(2) Scope of the Indian Rule

The Indian rule is limited, for it is restricted to transfer inter vivos, and does not apply to liabilities. The apportionment which the section contemplates is one following the transfer of the interest of the person entitled to receive the rent, and not the transfer of the interest of the person bound to pay it.[1156] A lessor transferring his interest to the assignee of the lessee is entitled to an apportionment of rent upto the date of the merger.[1157] When a decree is passed for the redemption of a mortgage, the apportionment of the rents of the mortgaged property is made as from the date when money is paid for redemption, and not from the date of the decree.[1158]

The section does not apply to transfers by operation of law as these are excluded by section 2(d). A purchaser at an execution sale acquires title by operation of law, and the rule of apportionment does not apply to execution sales.[1159]

A mortgage brought the mortgaged property to sale and bought the property himself at the court sale in November 1922. The rent for the year was payable on 1 April 1923. The mortgagor claimed that the rent should be apportioned and that he should receive the rent from 1 April 1922 till November 1922. But as it was an execution sale section 36 did not apply, and the mortgagee was held to be entitled to the whole year's rent payable on 1 April 1923.[1160]

Similarly, it has been held that section 36 does not apply to cases of partition, for a partition is not a "transfer";[1161] nor can the principle of the section be applied to such cases as, unlike cases of execution sales or succession where the transferee acquires a right to the property by the transaction, in the case of a partition, the person to whom a particular portion is allotted always had a right in that portion.[1162]

Prepaid rent is not rent, but a loan.[1163]

The section is applicable only between the transferor and transferee.[1164]

(3) No rule of Apportionment in the Act Apart from Section

These limitations on the section have not always been observed. In one case[1165] the lessor had only a life interest, and died a month before the rent of the half year was payable. Here there was no question of a transfer, and yet the assignee of the lessor was held to be entitled to an apportionment of rent for the period up to the death of the lessor. Again, in another case[1166] the liability to pay rent was apportioned between the lessee and his assignee, and in a third case[1167] the rule of apportionment was applied between a lessor and the purchaser of his interest at an execution sale. This decision has been followed by the Madras High Court.[1168] The rule has also been applied in the case of devolution of interest on succession.[1169] In all these cases the rule was applied as an equity. It is submitted, however, that this is erroneous, and that there is no such equity. A general rule of apportionment by time was then introduced by statute. The Indian rule is limited to transfers inter vivos.

(4) Maintenance

A Hindu widow's right to maintenance accrues from day to day. Therefore, on the death of a Hindu widow, her heirs are entitled to recover the maintenance allowance upto the day of her death, although the allowance has, for the convenience of the parties, been expressed to be payable on a fixed date.[1170]

(5) "Other Periodical Payment"

The same expression is used in the English Apportionment Act, 1870 and as to it, Lord Selbourne said—"They must be payments which are made periodically, recurring at fixed times, not at variable periods, nor in the exercise of the discretion of one or more individuals, but from some antecedent obligation; and, further, they must be in the nature of income; that is, coming in from some kind of investment".[1171] The expression does not, therefore, include the profits of a partnership which accrue only after the adjustment of accounts,[1172] nor the profits in a share of a village.[1173]

Whenever there are periodical payments accruing, and the event which calls for apportionment occurs, the TP Act is at once brought into operation and must be applied, and when subsequently the accruing payments become due and payable, they must be distributed in accordance with the TP Act.[1174]

(6) Sums Due Before the Event

Sums due in advance and due before the event which calls for apportionment are not apportioned. So where rent was payable quarterly in advance, and the landlord re-entered for non-payment of rent during the quarter, he was entitled to recover the whole rent.[1175]

(7) Payable

The section makes it clear that the apportionment does not affect the date when the payment is to be made by the person liable. Thus, if under a lease, rent is payable at the end of the year, an assignment by the lessor of his interest in the middle of the year will result in the transferor and the transferee being each entitled to half the rent, but the lessee still remains liable to pay only at the end of the year.[1176]

(8) Contract or Local Usage

The rule may be excluded by contract or local usage. Similarly, where a managing agent assigned his entire interest in the agency, the court inferred a contract to the contrary, and the transferor had no right to the commission for the period prior to the date of transfer.[1177]

In the case of agricultural rents, the Allahabad High Court makes the apportionment with reference not to the rent of the whole year, but with reference to the rent of the season in which the crop was reaped.[1178] In a Rangoon case,[1179] the court observed that agricultural rents are not apportionable as they accrue once and for all when the crops are reaped, and do not accrue from day to day. This, it would appear, is not correct, for it is precisely because rents do not accrue from day to day that the rule of apportionment has been applied to them by this section. A similar observation as to agricultural rents occurs in a Calcutta case,[1180] but there the apportionment was by estate, and the reference to section 36 seems to have been a mistake. Agricultural rents are excepted from the operation of section 37, but are subject to apportionment by time under section 36.

Under section 225 of the Agra Tenancy Act (Uttar Pradesh Act 3 of 1936) agricultural profits were divisible on fixed dates between the co-sharers. However, on the principle of this section it has been held that the co-sharer's right accrues from day to day. Therefore, his suit for a share of the profits is not premature if filed before the fixed date, and the amount due at the date of suit can be ascertained by apportionment.[1181]

37. Apportionment of benefit of obligation on severance.—When, in consequence of a transfer, property is divided and held in several shares, and thereupon the benefit of any obligation relating to the property as a whole passes from one to several owners of the property, the corresponding duty shall, in the absence of a contract to the contrary amongst the owners, be performed in favour of each of such owners in proportion to the value of his share in the property, provided that the duty can be severed and that the severance does not substantially increase the burden of the obligation; but if the duty cannot be severed, or if the severance would substantially increase the burden of the obligation the duty shall be performed for the benefit of such one of the several owners as they shall jointly designate for that purpose:

Provided that no person on whom the burden of the obligation lies shall be answerable for failure to discharge it in a manner provided by this section, unless and until he has had reasonable notice of the severance.

(1) Apportionment by Estate

This section refers to apportionment by estate, while the last section dealt with apportionment by time.

Prior to the TP Act, when a tenure was severed by the sale of shares in the reversion, the tenant was still obliged to pay the rent to all the sharers jointly, unless an apportionment had been agreed to by all the parties, or had been ordered in a suit to which all concerned were parties.[1182] If such an agreement had been arrived at, it was binding on the tenant.[1183]

However, under the present section, notice to the tenant is sufficient to convert the single obligation to pay rent to all into a several obligation to pay rent to each co-sharer. On receipt of the notice, the tenant is under an obligation to pay each sharer his proportionate part of the rent;[1184] but if a suit is necessary to enforce this obligation, it is still necessary to join all the sharers as parties.[1185] If no apportionment is made, the obligation remains single, and the lessor will not be allowed to split the tenancy by recovering the rent of a part only;[1186] nor can a purchaser of a part insist on payment of rent of his part only.[1187]

If a putnidar pays the land revenue payable to the zamindar direct to the treasury, that is a payment which can be apportioned between the co-sharers in the zamindari.[1188] If an estate consisting of several villages is apportioned, the division should be made according to the existing rents, and not those at the creation of the original tenure.[1189] Provision is also made in section 109 for apportionment of rent by agreement between all parties. Payment of rent by a tenant in good faith and without notice of a transfer is protected by section 50.

(2) Benefit of any Obligation

Rent is not the only instance of the benefit of an obligation attached to property, which is capable of being apportioned. When the lessor sells portions of the property leased, the covenants which run with the land run with the severed portions. The lessee is bound to perform the various obligations imposed upon him in favour of each sharer in the reversion, so far as such obligations are capable of severance, and such performance will not be to his prejudice.[1190]

(3) Does not Substantially Increase the Burden

This condition is the subject of the second illustration. There is a similar provision in section 30 of the Easements Act, 1882, that the severance into shares of the dominant heritage should not increase the burden on the servient heritage. The principle may be illustrated by a case which is not, however, within the section. An agricultural holding fell to be divided so that the fields were allotted to one co-owner and the appurtenant farmhouse in the abadi to another. The tenant was still entitled to continue to occupy the farmhouse, rent free.[1191]

(4) Provided that the Duty can be Severed

It must of course be possible to perform the duty separately, otherwise it must be performed jointly. This is explained in the first illustration where the duty to deliver a sheep cannot be severed.

(5) Notice

Notice may be given by the assignor or by the assignee.[1192] The notice has of course no bearing on the title of the assignee.

(6) Section not Applicable

The section is subject to section 2(d) and is, therefore, not applicable to involuntary transfers or to cases of succession. The heirs of deceased creditors are only jointly entitled to enforce the right which the deceased, if alive, could singly enforce.[1193]

(7) Agricultural Tenancies

These tenancies have been exempted, as the severance of the obligation to pay rent would cause much harassment to agriculturists.[1194]

(B) TRANSFER OF IMMOVABLE PROPERTY

A, a Hindu widow, whose husband has left collateral heirs, alleging that the property held by her as such is insufficient for her maintenance, agrees, for purposes neither religious nor charitable to sell a field, part of such property, to B. B satisfies himself by reasonable enquiry that the income of the property is insufficient for A's maintenance, and that the sale of the field is necessary, and acting in good faith, buys the field from A. As between B on the one part and A and the collateral heirs on the other part, a necessity for the sale shall be deemed to have existed.

(1) Rest of Chapter II Applies to Immovable Property only

This group of sections, i.e., sections 38 to 53, applies to immovable property only. The preceding group, i.e., sections 33 to 37, applies both to immovable and movable property.

(2) Limited Power of Transfer

The scope of this section is very restricted. It does not apply to cases falling under section 41 of benamidars or ostensible owners who can give no title except by estoppel; nor to cases under section 64 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882, of persons purchasing in good faith for consideration without notice of a trust. However, it refers to cases such as those arising under Hindu law where the power of transfer of the person representing the estate depends upon circumstances in their nature variable. Thus, a Hindu widow under the classical Hindu law had no power to dispose of immovable property except for purposes which the Hindu law recognises as constituting legal necessity. The manager of a joint Hindu family has power to sell or mortgage joint family property only for purposes of legal necessity, or for debts incurred in the family business, or for the benefit of the estate. The father of a joint Hindu family may sell or mortgage joint family property to discharge his own antecedent debt not incurred for an immoral or an illegal purpose. So also, the natural guardian of a Hindu minor has power to sell or mortgage any part of the minor's estate in case of necessity or for the benefit of the estate. A transfer in excess of such limited power is voidable, but the transferee is protected if he has made inquiries with reasonable care, and has acted honestly in the real belief that there were justifying circumstances.

The section would appear to be based on the leading case of Hunnooman Persaud v Babooe,[1195] and particularly the following passage:

> The power of a manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, is under the Hindu law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in case of need, or for the benefit of the estate...The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded...Their Lordships think that the lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself as well as he can, with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate. But they think that if he does so inquire, and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient and reasonably-credited necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of his charge, and they do not think that under such circumstances, he is bound to see to the application of the money.

This principle applies not only to the case of a manager for an infant, but also to alienations by a Hindu widow under the classical Hindu law, or other limited heir,[1196] and to transactions in which a father in derogation of the rights of his son under Mitakshara law has made an alienation of an ancestral family estate.[1197] Thus, where upon a settlement made by a Hindu widow, she retained a portion of land for her maintenance in which she had only a life interest and transferred the rest of the property, a sale by her during her lifetime of the life interest would be void.[1198] It also applies to alienations by a mohunt or shebait of debtor property.[1199] An executor under pure Hindu law has no greater powers than the manager of a minor's estate.[1200]

(3) Circumstances in their Nature Variable

This expression refers, in cases of Hindu alienations, to the facts that constitute legal necessity in Hindu law. These vary according to the facts of each case, and the status of the transferor. A stepmother purporting to act on behalf of a minor stepson is a person authorized "only under circumstances in their nature variable to dispose off immovable property".[1201] The transaction must be judged in the circumstances prevailing at the time it took place, and not by subsequent events.[1202]

(4) Before Transfer

The section has no application before transfer where the transaction is still incomplete.[1203]

(5) Onus of Proof

The onus of proving justifying circumstances is on the transferee. Where a mortgagee from a Hindu widow seeks to enforce his mortgage, the onus is on him to prove that the money was borrowed for a legitimate purpose.[1204] One who claims title under a conveyance from a woman, with the usual limited interest which a woman takes, and who seeks to enforce that title against reversioners, is always subject to proving not only the genuineness of his conveyance, but the full comprehension by the limited owners of the nature of the alienation she was making, and also that the alienation was justified by necessity, or at least that the alienee did all that was reasonable to satisfy himself of the existence of such necessity.[1205] Actual proof of the necessity which justified the deed is not essential to its validity; it is only necessary that a representation should have been made to the purchaser that such necessity existed, and that he should have acted honestly and made proper inquiry to satisfy himself of its truth.[1206] If the alienation is by a father for payment of antecedent debts, the burden is on the transferee to prove that the debt existed, or that after proper inquiry he honestly believed that it existed.[1207] The burden is then shifted on the son to show that the debt was contracted for an immoral purpose, and that the transferee had actual or constructive notice of the nature of the debt.[1208] It has been stated in a Madras case[1209] that whereas in the case of an alienation for necessities, the transferee need not actually prove the existence of the necessity, and that he can claim the benefit of section 38 if he shows that he had made reasonable inquiries, in the case of an alienation for an antecedent debt, the transferee must show the existence of the debt as otherwise "it would not be held that the enquiry was full or bona fide". This distinction would appear to be unsound, for it would be a question of fact whether the transferee had used reasonable care and acted in good faith in the circumstances of each case.

Recitals by the transferor are not generally sufficient proof of necessity,[1210] for they may only have been inserted at the instance of the transferee.[1211] They must, therefore, be supplemented by evidence aliunde.[1212] A sale deed executed by a Hindu widow recited the payment of family debts as the necessity justifying the sale. But the purchaser made no inquiry of the creditors named in the deed and was, therefore, not protected by this section.[1213] However, as time goes by and the original parties to the transaction and all those who could have given evidence have passed away, recitals assume greater importance, and if the circumstances are such as to justify a reasonable belief that an inquiry would have confirmed their truth, they would be sufficient to support the deed.[1214] In such cases presumptions are admissible to fill in details which have been obliterated by time.[1215]

The lender is not bound to see to the application of the money.[1216] In the judgment in Hunooman Persaud's case LJ Knight Bruce said:

> The purposes for which a loan is wanted are often future, as regards the actual application, and a lender can rarely have, unless he enters on the management, the means of controlling and rightly directing the actual application. Their Lordships do not think that a bona fide creditor should suffer when he has acted honestly and with due caution, but is himself deceived.

Accordingly, a sale or mortgage may be justified by legal necessity although as to part of the consideration, such necessity has not been established.[1217] The Allahabad High Court has held that this was so only when the unaccounted part was small, but not if it was considerable.[1218] However, this view was disapproved by the Privy Council, and it was held that if the sale itself is justified by legal necessity, and the purchaser pays a fair price for the property sold, and acts in good faith after due inquiry as to the necessity for the sale, the mere fact that part of the price is not proved to have been applied to the purposes of necessity does not invalidate the sale, and the sale should be upheld unconditionally, irrespective of whether the part proved to have been applied to the purposes of necessity is considerable or small.[1219]

39. Transfer where third person is entitled to maintenance.—Where a third person has a right to receive maintenance, or a provision for advancement or marriage, from the profits of immovable property, and such property is transferred, [1220][] the right may be enforced against the transferee, if he has notice [1221][thereof] or if the transfer is gratuitous; but not against a transferee for consideration and without notice of the right, nor against such property in his hands.

(2) Maintenance not a Charge

The right of maintenance, even of a Hindu widow, is an indefinite right which falls short of a charge.[1223] It is not a charge unless it has been made a charge by decree or agreement,[1224] or unless the widow is in possession of specific property allotted for her maintenance.[1225] In such cases, notice of the charge is sufficient to bind the transferee. However, in some cases it had been held that a charge for maintenance created by a decree was binding on a transferee irrespective of whether he had notice of the charge.[1226] Those decisions proceeded on the view that the effect of a charge was similar to that of a mortgage, in that it placed a limitation on the ownership of the property.[1227] Those decisions, however, were not correct, for even before the Amending Act of 1929 it was clear that a charge did not, like a mortgage, create an interest in property,[1228] and the amended section 100 expressly enacts that a charge cannot be enforced against a transferee for consideration without notice. This section purports to deal with a right of maintenance or the like which, not having been made a charge by decree or agreement, falls short of a charge.[1229]

(3) Right under the Amended Section

Under the amended section, the right of the widow is more effectively protected. It is not necessary that the transferee should be aware of an intention to defraud the widow or to defeat her right to maintenance.[1230] If he is a transferee for consideration, he takes subject to the right if he has notice of it. If he is a gratuitous transferee, he takes subject to the right, irrespective of whether he has notice of it. The amended section is not intended to create a charge where none existed. The effect of the amendment is to make it unnecessary for the widow to prove that the transfer was made with the intention of defeating her right.[1231]

(4) Enhanced Maintenance

It has been held[1232] that the right to receive maintenance protected by the section is not merely the right to receive such maintenance in the first instance, but also the right to receive enhanced maintenance in the future if there has been a material change in the circumstances.

(5) Right of Residence

Where, by way of settlement of disputes between the husband and the wife, property is given to the wife by the husband for her separate residence during her lifetime, it is a part of the arrangement for the grant of maintenance. Subsequent alienation by the husband cannot divest her from her possession till her death, and the transferee (from the husband) is not entitled to possession till her death. Section 39 applies to such a situation. The word "maintenance" in the section covers residence also.[1233]

(6) Maintenance not Secured by Decree

Under Hindu Law, the maintenance of a wife by her husband is, of course, a matter of personal obligation which attaches from the moment of marriage. From the date of marriage her home is necessarily in her husband's home. He is bound to maintain her in it if she is willing to reside with him and discharge her duties. The doctrine of maintenance of a wife can be traced to the smritis, and the principal Hindu commentaries upon them. These texts enjoin a mandatory duty upon the husband to maintain his wife. It imposes a personal obligation on him enforceable by the sovereign or state. However, this does not mean that the obligation is not referred at all to his property, and that he can alienate all his property and deprive his wife of the right to maintenance from the income of his property. The personal obligation on the part of the husband to maintain the wife is even wider, in the sense that his obligation will exist if he has no properties from which he could derive any income. Even according to the ancient texts, the wife was supposed to be a co-owner of her husband's property, though in a secondary sense. The Hindu female's right to maintenance is a tangible right against property flowing from the relationship between the husband and wife and is recognised, and has been strongly stressed even by the earlier Hindu jurists starting from Yajnavalkya to Manu. Even without a charge, the claim for maintenance is doubtless a pre-existing right enforceable against the property in the hands of alienee with notice of her claim.[1234]

It is not necessary that the right to maintenance should become crystallised in the form of a decree to enable the wife to proceed against the property in the hands of the husband or his transferees. Merely because, at the time when the settlement deed was executed, the wife had not obtained a decree for maintenance would not mean that she will not be entitled to enforce the right of maintenance against the property gratuitously transferred by the husband in favour of a transferee or a gratuitous transferee.[1235] If the husband gifted the properties in favour of the concubine without making provision for the maintenance of the wife, then the wife will be entitled to have a charge against the very properties, and enforce the same.[1236] It is not open to a husband to effect an alienation of his properties, when such alienation has the effect of depriving her and other dependants of their maintenance. A wife and children can, therefore, have a charge upon the properties of the husband, and can enforce the same against a gratuitous transferee.[1237] However, if the husband transfers the property with the knowledge of his wife and children the latter as such would have no claim of maintenance against the transferee.[1238]

(7) Notice

The provision as to notice marks the difference between the old section and the new. Under the old section, the transferee was not bound, unless he had notice of the intention to defeat the right of the widow. Under the new section, notice of the existence of the right is sufficient to bind the transferee.[1239] If he is a bona fide transferee for valuable consideration without notice, he is not bound.[1240] Under section 3, the notice may be either actual or constructive. Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that the expression "notice" used should have a broad connotation, and cannot be construed literally to mean an information given. Aptly, it should mean knowledge and awareness. It was held that as long as a right exists under the law, it is obvious notice to one and all.[1241] The Kerala High Court has held, on facts, that, when property was alienated to a member of the same family, it cannot be said that the transferee had no notice of the matrimonial dispute.[1242]

(8) Enforceability as Between the Mother and Son Irrespective of Notice

As a woman is entitled to maintenance not only from the husband, but also from sons who were members of a joint family, the wife has a right to ask for a charge on the entire family property irrespective of whether they had effected division between them. A son cannot plead want of notice about his mother being entitled to get maintenance from out of the income of the joint family property. Partition can have no impact whatsoever on the mother's right.[1243]

(9) Family Debts

Under the Hindu law, debts contracted for the benefit of the family take precedence over a widow's claim for maintenance,[1244] and if family property is alienated for the discharge of debts binding on the family, the right of the alienee overrides the right of the widow, even if he had notice of her claim for maintenance.[1245] However, when maintenance has been expressly charged on the property, it takes precedence over the right of an execution purchaser even though the decree was for a debt binding on the family.[1246] Although the husband's debts may override the widow's claim for maintenance, she has a right to challenge debts incurred by a coparcener, such as a son or a brother of her deceased husband, and to enforce her rights against the property sold to pay off those debts, unless it be proved that they had been incurred for family necessity.[1247]

(10) Advancement

Provisions for advancement are unknown among Indians.[1248] The rule of English law by which a child who has received an advancement, must bring the amount into hotchpot in the case the father's intestacy had been omitted in the Indian Succession Act, 1925; and has been held not to apply to Parsees.[1249] Among persons subject to English law, a purchase by a father in the name of a daughter is presumed to be an advancement, and not to be benami or colourable.[1250]

(11) Marriage

Under Mitakshara law, joint family property is liable for the legitimate marriage expenses of male members of the family,[1251] and their daughters,[1252] but not for the marriage of minors.[1253] Under this section as amended, a transferee having notice of such liability at the time of transfer would take subject to it section 40.

1254. Subs. by Act 20 of 1929, sec. 12, for "of the latter property or to compel its enjoyment in a particular manner".

(2) First Paragraph—Right of Transferor Against Purchaser from Transferee

The second para of section 11 relates to right of transferor as against the transferee to (1) enforce the performance of an affirmative covenant; (2) restrain breach of a negative covenant. The first para of present section relates to the right of transferor as against a purchaser from a transferee to restrain the breach of a negative covenant. This paragraph, before it was amended, also recognised the right of the transferor to compel the performance of an affirmative covenant as against a purchaser from the transferee. It contained the words "to compel its enjoyment," but those words have now been omitted. The effect of the omission is that an affirmative covenant can no longer be enforced against a purchaser from a transferee. The reason for the amendment is explained under section 11.

The "third person" spoken of in the first paragraph is either the original covenantee, or his transferee. For instance, if A owns two properties X and Y, and sells X to B, he may impose a restriction on B that he shall, for the more beneficial enjoyment of Y, keep open a portion of X adjoining Y and not build on it. The "third person" may be A who has no longer any interest in X or any easement thereon, or he may be a purchaser of Y from A whom we shall call C. If B sells X to D, and D has notice of the covenant and D threatens to build on the whole of X, A or C may restrain D from doing so.

(3) Restrictive Covenants

In English law, a covenant may be something more than a mere agreement. A covenant may (1) amount to the grant or reservation of an equitable interest in land or an easement; or (2) it may be a personal contract. If the covenant creates or reserves a legal easement, the transferee takes subject to the easement; if it creates or reserves an equitable interest in land, the transferee takes subject to that interest, unless he acquires a legal estate without notice or is protected by want of registration. If the covenant is only a personal contract, the general rule of English common law is that all contracts are personal and the covenant does not bind the transferee. To this general rule that contracts are personal there are two exceptions—(1) leases; and (2) covenants annexed to the land.

The law in India closely follows the law of England as to covenants. The benefit of a covenant for quiet enjoyment in a lease may be enforced by the assignee of the lessee under section 108(c), while the rights and liabilities of the lessor's transferee are dealt with in section 109.

The principle that a covenant is annexed to the land, if it binds the land in its inception or affects the nature, quality or value of the land, was adopted by the Calcutta High Court in Mathewson v Ram Kanai Singh.[1255] Such covenants are referred to in sections 55(2) (sale), 65 (mortgage), and 108(c) (lease), where it is expressly enacted that the benefit of such covenants runs with the interest of the covenantee.

The equitable rule that the burden of a covenant runs with the land is enacted in this section.[1256] The amendment of the section by Act 20 of 1929 represents the English rule which limits the doctrine to restrictive covenants, for a positive covenant never runs with the land either in law, or in equity.[1257] Even before the amendment, the Bombay High Court doubted if the section applied to affirmative covenants involving the expenditure of money. In Chaturbhuj v Mansukhram,[1258] the owner of four houses and a chowk or courtyard sold three houses and the chowk to the plaintiff, and covenanted to close the window of the fourth house overlooking the chowk, and to slope the eaves so as to prevent rain water falling onto the chowk. The owner then sold the fourth house to the defendant. The plaintiff sued the defendant to enforce the covenants, but the suit was dismissed on the ground that even if the covenants were restrictive covenants (which the court held they were not), the defendant had purchased without notice of the covenants. In this case the vendor was the covenantor, but the more usual case is for the vendor to be the covenantee as in Tulk v Moxhay,[1259] wherein it was held that in equity, a restrictive covenant imposed for the benefit of land retained by the lessor or grantor was binding on a purchaser with notice. In other words, a covenant restricting the user of land runs with the land in equity. This doctrine applies only to restrictive or negative covenants. The doctrine cannot be extended to affirmative covenants such as a covenant compelling a man to lay out money, or to do an act of an active character. The covenant must be one restricting or affecting the user of the land, and the remedy is not the remedy at law by way of specific performance under a specific or implied penalty, but merely in equity by injunction against the violation of the covenant.[1260]

The case law in India as to restrictive covenants is meagre, and it has not yet been decided whether a restrictive covenant would be binding on a trespasser, or a mere occupier. The section expressly says that the right of the covenantee is not an interest in the land bound by the covenant, nor an easement. It is not an interest because the TP Act does not recognise equitable estates,[1261] and it cannot be said as Sir George Jessel said that if the covenant "binds the land it creates an equitable interest in the land."[1262] But although the section says that the right is not an easement, it would probably be held that the covenantee had a paramount right analogous to an easement and, therefore, binding on an occupier or trespasser.

(4) Building Schemes

A covenantor may sometimes be entitled to the benefit of a restrictive covenant as against other covenantors. This may occur when land is sold in plots under a building scheme. The conditions of sale prescribed restrictive covenants to be entered into by the purchasers of each lot, and the presumption is that the covenant is for their mutual benefit.[1263] In Torbay Hotel v Jenkins,[1264] the court said—

> Where an owner of land deals with his land on the footing of imposing restrictive obligations on the use of the various portions of it and as when he alienates them for the common benefit of himself (so far as he retains any land) and of the various purchasers inter se, a court of Equity will give effect to this common intention, notwithstanding the absence of mutual covenants, provided that the intention that there should be a mutual obligation is efficiently established.

If no such intention is established, the benefit of the covenant will not pass, for it would be merely a personal covenant. This was the case in Chambers v Randall,[1265] where the vendor sold plots for building purposes with covenants restrictive of the nature of the building to be erected, and J Sargant said that "the object of the covenant was to enable the vendor to protect his property while he retained it, and to make the most of it when he disposed it off." On the other hand, if the intention is established, each purchaser or his assignee can enforce the covenant against the other purchasers.[1266] However, there must be reasonably clear definition as to the area within which the mutual obligations are intended to operate.[1267] A covenant by a purchaser not to use burdened property "for any purpose other than that of a single private dwelling house" does not mean that any number of dwelling houses may be erected on the land, provided that each is used only as a single private dwelling house. The contention that any number of private dwelling houses could be constructed was negatived by the court.[1268]

(5) Affirmative Covenants

Affirmative covenants are collateral; they are not annexed to the land and do not run with the land. Covenants to lay out money in building or repairs cannot be enforced against the purchaser from the covenantor.[1269] A positive covenant never runs with the land either in law, or in equity.[1270]

In Halsall v Brizell,[1271] however, J Upjohn was considering the case of a developed estate in which the developers retained the ownership of roads and sewers. Under certain covenants, the developers were obliged to permit purchasers of properties in the estate to use them, and the purchasers were obliged to contribute towards the cost. The question arose whether the successors of the original purchasers were bound to contribute to the cost of the roads and sewers. The court held that the successors could not be sued on the covenant for it was a positive covenant, which did not run with the land, but that it is "ancient law that a man cannot take benefit under a deed without subscribing to the obligations thereunder". The court held that the successors had no right to use the roads and sewers except under the deed, and that as they desired to take its benefits, they were bound by the covenants contained in it.[1272]

A covenant of indemnity is a personal covenant, and is, therefore, not a covenant running with the land, and cannot be enforced by a purchaser of the land.[1273] A covenant in a sale deed by which the vendor retained a certain portion of the land free from payment of land revenue did not amount to a covenant by the vendors or their heirs and transferees to pay the land revenue in respect of the lands retained by the vendor, and that even if it did, it was not binding on the heirs or transferees for it was not a covenant running with land.[1274] A covenant for the reconveyance of a right of easement is also a personal covenant, and does not run with the land.[1275]

ILLUSTRATION

A, a Hindu female, sold a plot of land in which she had only a limited interest (as a daughter under Hindu law as interpreted in Madras) to B. Her husband, D executed an agreement of indemnity agreeing to convey to B an equivalent plot of land, in case B should be dispossessed. B sold the land to P who after the death of A was dispossessed by A's son. P then sued D on the agreement of indemnity to recover possession of the equivalent plot of land. The suit was dismissed, as an agreement of indemnity is a collateral agreement and not a covenant running with the land. There was, moreover, no privity of a contract between P and D.[1276]

In an Allahabad case,[1277] an affirmative covenant to pull down rooms on a passage was enforced against a transferee from the vendee, but the case was decided on the law as it stood before the amendment of the section.

Leases

Leases have always been an exception to this rule, and a covenant to pay rent is a covenant annexed to the land, and the benefit of it passes to the lessor's assignee—section 109. The lessee's assignee is liable by privity of estate.[1278] On the other hand, in the case of a sale, a covenant to pay money is purely a personal covenant, and cannot run with the land. Should a vendee covenant on behalf of himself, his heirs and assigns, that he or they would pay ₹20 annually for the sheba of a thakur, a subsequent purchaser is not bound by the covenant, for there is no such thing between a vendor and purchaser as a covenant to pay money running with the land.[1279] In an Allahabad case,[1280] a covenant that the vendee would pay the vendor zarichaharam, i.e., a fourth of the purchase money, in case he sold the land, was held not to run with the land. The court dissented from a previous decision,[1281] but omitted to notice that it was a case of lease. Between a head lessor and a sub-lessee, there is neither privity of contract, nor privity of estate. A sub-lessee, is therefore, not liable for a covenant in the lease to pay a specified rent, such covenant being an affirmative covenant.[1282]

(6) Covenant Running with the Land

This is an expression borrowed from English law of real property, where it describes a covenant "annexed to the land" and which is an exception to the general rule that all covenants are personal. A covenant may run with the land (i) at law; or (ii) in equity.

(i) A covenant runs with the land at law when the benefit of it passes to the assignee of the covenantee or when the burden of it passes to the assignee of the covenantor, and, in either case independently of notice. A grants subsoil rights below his surface land to a colliery company who covenants to pay damages if they cause a subsidence of the surface land. A sells his surface land to B. B can enforce the covenant because it is a covenant the benefit of which runs with the land at law.[1283] The burden of a covenant only runs at law in the case of an assignment of a lease.

(ii) A covenant runs with the land in equity when the burden of it can be enforced against the assignee of the covenantor under the rule in Tulk v Moxhay. A sells a park in front of his house to B, who covenants not to build upon it. B sells the park to C who has notice of the covenant. A can enforce the covenant against C, for it is a covenant running with the land in equity.

Indian law

Under the TP Act, covenants of which the benefit runs with the land at law are covenants for title implied in sales under section 55(2), the covenant implied in mortgages under section 65, and in respect of leases, the covenant for quiet enjoyment implied in section 108(c). A covenant to pay rents and taxes is a covenant that runs with the land;[1284] so also is a covenant in a lease that the lessee will pay the lessor a share of the purchase money if he should assign the lease;[1285] or a covenant in a patni lease that the covenantor shall submit year after year in the landlords' office jamavahipatiaks and lawazama patika;[1286] or a covenant granting to the lessor the right to use certain roads.[1287] As these covenants run with the land at law, they are enforceable by any person in whom the interest in the property of the covenantee is vested, irrespective of notice.

Under the TP Act, covenants that run with the land in equity are the restrictive covenants referred to in the first paragraph of this section where the rule in Tulk v Moxhay is followed. As these covenants run with the land in equity, they cannot be enforced against a purchaser for value without notice as stated in the last paragraph of the section.

Pre-emption

Covenants for pre-emption have been described as covenants running with the land.[1288] This use of the expression was deprecated by J Strachey,[1289] and it is altogether incorrect. Such covenants are personal and collateral covenants falling under the second paragraph of the section. This has now been clearly held by the Supreme Court,[1290] and the decisions referred to above to the contrary are no longer good law.

Illustration

A sells his field to B who covenants that if he wishes to sell it, he will give A the first refusal. B sells the field to C who has notice of the agreement for ₹1,00,000 A may require C to sell the field to him for ₹1,00,000. This illustration should be contrasted with the two preceding illustrations which were of covenants running with the land at law and in equity. The covenant in this illustration is not annexed to the land at all. It is purely a personal covenant and is enforceable for personal reasons. It was unconscionable of B to break his agreement and sell to C and, as C had notice of the agreement, it was equally unconscionable of him to buy.

Agreement to pay commission on extraction of coal

An agreement to pay commission on coal extracted from a mine and sold, is not a covenant running with the land.[1291]

(7) Covenants in a Lease and Assignment

A covenant entered between a lessor and a lessee is personally binding between the two. However, upon an assignment of the reversion or a term, it may be binding on the assignee. Similarly, the benefit of the covenant may pass to them. If the covenant is by the lessor for the benefit of the lessee, and directly touches the land, it runs with the land in favour of the assignee. An option to renew the lease runs with the land. In the case in question both the covenants to put up a building and to renew the lease, run with the land. The liability to put up a building having been discharged by the original lessee, the right to exercise the option of renewing the lease passed to the assignee. The contention that every assignee of a part of the tenement is bound to put up a building on the parcel of the land assigned to him, is unreasonable and by the very nature of things is impossible of performance. The leasehold interest having been served by agreement of the parties, each of the assignees was entitled to enforce the term providing for the renewal so far as his separate part was concerned, irrespective of the others.[1292]

(8) Contractual Obligation

The right referred to in the first paragraph of the section has come into existence before the transfer, and presupposes ownership of property. The right referred to in the second paragraph has also come into existence before the transfer, but does not presuppose ownership of property. It is a purely personal right arising out of contract, and the person who has the right need not be the owner of any property at all. But the right though personal, must be annexed to the ownership of immovable property. The illustration shows that the purchaser under a contract of sale of land has the right defined in the second paragraph. That right in English law is an equitable estate in land. But, as explained in section 5, the Indian legislature has eschewed the doctrine of equitable ownership. According to section 3 of the Indian Trust Acts, 1882, what would be in English law the equitable estate of the cestui que trust is the benefit of an obligation annexed to the ownership of property. Section 54 of TP Act expressly states that a contract of sale of immovable property does not, of itself, create an interest in or charge upon such property, but it creates an obligation, the fiduciary character of which is recognised in section 3 of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, and in section 91 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882. A contract for sale, therefore, does not create an interest in land, but creates a personal obligation of a fiduciary character which can be enforced by a suit for specific performance not only against the vendor, but also against a volunteer and a purchaser for consideration with notice.[1293] A contract of sale (as provided by last two paragraphs of section 40) creates an obligation annexed to ownership of property.[1294]

A reading of sections 40 and 54 of the TP Act and section 91 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 makes it clear that the subsequent transferee with notice stands in a fiduciary capacity and holds the property in trust to the prior agreement holder, but the prior agreement holder cannot automatically become the owner by seeking declaratory relief, and has to necessarily file a suit for specific performance impleading both the vendor and the subsequent transferee.[1295]

In some cases, this fiduciary obligation has been held to be a defence to a suit for ejectment although no suit for specific performance had been filed. But these cases are, in effect, overruled by the decision of the Privy Council in Main Pir Bus v Sardar Mahomed Tahar.[1296]

An agreement to pay maintenance out of land, which fell short of creating a charge on any specific property has been said to create a contractual obligation under the second paragraph of this section, and not to be enforceable against a purchaser without notice.[1297] However, where an agreement creates a perpetual charge such as for the payment of an annuity out of a specific property, it is binding on the subsequent transferee for value with notice or a volunteer with or without notice.[1298]

It has been held that the second para of section 40 does not apply to rights in the nature of easements.[1299] The Supreme Court has held that the liability to pay for the estate under section 5(1) of the Estate Duty Act, 1953, arises upon the death of the real owner and not of the benamidar, who is merely an ostensible owner.[1300]

Where a simple mortgage deed was executed in favour of the plaintiff and the mortgagor thereafter sold a part of the mortgaged property to another person by a registered sale deed and the earlier mortgage-deed was registered at a later date, it was held in the suit filed by the plaintiff against the mortgagor and the purchaser to recover the mortgage amount, the purchaser cannot claim that the mortgage was not binding on him on the ground that as the mortgage deed was registered at a date later than the date of sale in his favour, he should be taken to be a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice of the mortgage and, therefore, entitled to protection under second para of section 40. Under section 58 of the TP Act, mortgage is a mode of transfer by which an interest in property is created. An interest in property then would not remain simplicitor an obligation arising out of a contract and thus, stands excluded from falling within the protection of the second para of section 40.[1301]

Even under the second para of section 40 there must be a right or obligation for that purpose arising out of a contract and annexed to the ownership of immovable property for the purpose of its enforcement against a gratuitous transferee or a transferee for consideration with the notice of the right or obligation.[1302] Where, even though property was agreed to be sold at ₹3,50,000, it was sold subsequently for ₹61,000, it was held that it is the bounden duty of the purchaser to make all such necessary inquiries and to ascertain all the facts relating to the property to be purchased prior to committing in any manner and hence, he cannot simply come forward to put up a general plea that he is the bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, especially when the purchase is not for the proper value.[1303]

(9) Attachment

There is a conflict of decisions as to whether the obligation annexed by this section to the ownership of property by a contract of sale will prevail against claims enforceable under an attachment. If after a creditor C has attached A's property, and A sells it to B, the conveyance to B will be subject to the claims of C enforceable under the attachment. This is because under section 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 any private transfer by A after the attachment will be void as against such claims. The question, however, if the subsequent conveyance was in pursuance of an agreement of sale which was before the attachment, whether the claims of C enforceable under the attachment be subject to the obligation created by the contract of sale to B. In Taraknath v Sanatkumar,[1304] J Cuming held that the contractual obligation could not prevail against the rights of attaching creditor. However, in Madan Mohan v Rebait Mohan,[1305] J Woodroffe held that the contractual obligation prevailed over the attachment. The Madras High Court had taken the same view on the ground that if a creditor attaches property which is subject to a particular obligation, he should not be able to override it.[1306] In the case of an attachment before judgment, this is so expressly provided by o 38, r 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908. Again, if after the attachment the vendee filed a suit for specific performance of the contract and the court enforced execution of a conveyance, it is clear that such conveyance would not be a private transfer subject to the provisions of section 64 of the Civil Procedure Code 1908.[1307] The right of a purchaser under section 40 entitling him to the benefit of an obligation arising out of the contract of sale of land by enforcing it against the transferee with notice is an equitable right, though not amounting to interest in immovable property within the meaning of section 53 of TP Act which declares that a contract of sale does not create an interest in the property. On this line of reasoning, it was held by the Madras High Court that the purchaser under an antecedent agreement gets a good title despite attachment.[1308] The attaching creditor attaches only the right, title and interest of the debtor, and attachment cannot confer upon him any right higher than what the judgment debtor had at the date of attachment. Hence, under a contract of sale entered into before attachment, the conveyance and after attachment in pursuance of the contract, passes on good title inspite of the attachment.[1309] Even if the property is sold in execution, he can enforce specific performance of his contract against the auction purchaser.[1310]

According to a Madras case which reiterates the earlier view of the high court, an attaching decree-holder attaches not the physical property, but only the right of the judgment debtor in the property. That right is, on the date of attachment, qualified by the obligation incurred by him under the earlier agreement to sell or mortgage and the attaching decree-holder cannot ignore that obligation, and cannot bring the property to sale as if it remained an absolute property of the judgment-debtor.[1311]

According to the Punjab and Haryana High Court, a sale in pursuance of a pre-attachment agreement is a private alienation of property which must be regarded as void against the claim of a decree-holder, though not against the claims of other persons. The object of section 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 is the protection of the attaching creditor against a transfer made during the attachment.[1312] The Supreme Court disagreeing with the view taken in Mohinder Singh's case has now held that the agreement for sale creates an obligation attached to the ownership of property, and since the attaching creditor is entitled to attach only the right, title and interest of the judgment debtor, the attachment cannot be free from obligations incurred under the contract for sale. The right of the attaching creditor shall not be allowed to override the contractual obligation arising from an antecedent agreement for sale of the attached property.[1313]

In a later decision without expressing any opinion with regard to the case of an agreement for sale, the Supreme Court opined that a sale deed having been executed prior to attachment before judgment, though registered subsequently, will prevail over attachment before judgment.[1314]

(10) Pre-emption

The nature of a covenant for pre-emption under the TP Act has been considered in the commentary on section 14.[1315] It was submitted in earlier editions to this work that such a covenant was a personal covenant not creating any interest in property, and that certain decisions to the contrary were incorrect. It is unnecessary to further consider this question as the Supreme Court has clearly upheld the view expressed in earlier editions of this work, and held that such a covenant was a personal covenant.[1316] As a personal contract it is binding on the parties thereto and their personal representatives, and it creates an obligation arising out of the contract and is binding on a purchaser for value with notice, and on a gratuitous transferee under the second part of this section.[1317] The benefit of the covenant cannot, however, be transferred as it is restricted in enjoyment to the covenantee.[1318]

(11) Notice

Notice of the contractual obligation may be constructive notice.[1319] Thus, it is sufficient notice if the contract is entered in the wajib-ul-ars of the village,[1320] or the contract was for sale to a mortgagee who is in possession.[1321] In a small village, when any transaction takes place, it becomes common knowledge. A subsequent purchaser of land were deemed to have knowledge of an earlier sale agreement when all the parties belonged to the same village.[1322] A person having full notice and knowledge of facts of existence of a previous contract, even through public notice published in a newspaper, cannot be held to be a bonafide purchaser without notice.[1323]

(12) Court Sale

A purchaser at a court sale is a transferee by operation of law, and is, therefore, not a transferee within the meaning of this section. It has been suggested that the principle of the second para of this section might apply to him.[1324] The point was raised before the Privy Council, but was not actually decided as the purchaser had not an unequivocal notice of the contract. Lord Dunedin, however, observed that "judicial sales would be robbed of all their sanctity if vague references to antecedent contracts could be held to invalidate the buyer's title."[1325] In an Allahabad case, it was assumed that the Official Receiver in whom the property had vested by operation of law was a transferee under this section.[1326]

41. Transfer by ostensible owner.—Where, with the consent, express or implied, of the persons interested in immovable property, a person is the ostensible owner of such property and transfers the same for consideration, the transfer shall not be voidable on the ground that the transferor was not authorised to make it:

Provided that the transferee, after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, has acted in good faith.

(1) Principle

The foundation of the section is the following well-known passage from the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Ramcoomar v Mac-queen:[1327]

1327. Ramcoomar v Mac-queen, (1872) 11 Beng LR 46, p 52, followed in Seshumull M Shah v Sayed Abdul Rashid, AIR 1991 Kant 273, p 278.

> It is a principle of natural equity which must be universally applicable that, where one man allows another to hold himself out as the owner of an estate and a third person purchases it, for value, from the apparent owner in the belief that he is the real owner, the man who so allows the other to hold himself out shall not be permitted to recover upon his secret title, unless he can overthrow that of the purchaser by showing either that he had direct notice, or something which amounts to constructive notice, of the real title; or that there existed circumstances which ought to have put him upon an enquiry that, if prosecuted, would have led to a discovery of it.

The section is a statutory application of the law of estoppel,[1328] the general principle of which is thus stated by the House of Lords in Cairncross v Lorimer:[1329]

> If a man, either by words or by conduct, has initiated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they might have abstained—he cannot question the legality of the act he had so sanctioned—to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct.

The law of estoppel is enacted in section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 and Shepherd and Brown point out that the leading case on that section falls equally under section 41 of the TP Act. In that case,[1330] the owner transferred property to his wife as benamidar and after his death she mortgaged the property, her son assisting in the transaction and receiving the mortgage money. The son was held to be estopped from disputing the mortgage, while if this section had been applied, the case would have been decided on the ground that by the consent of the son, the mother was the ostensible owner.

The transferee will be protected only if he has acted in good faith after taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor has power to make the transfer.[1331] The transferee who willfully shuts his eyes and takes the transfer without any inquiry is not protected. The transferee is also required to show that he had purchased the property after taking care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer. What is reasonable care depends upon the facts and circumstances of each case, and no hard and fast rules can be laid down.[1332]

The principle of this section applies to the territory of Delhi.[1333] The section makes an exception to the rule that a person cannot confer a better title than he has.[1334]

(2) Court Sale

The section applies only to voluntary transfers, and has no application to court sales.[1335] The provisions of sections 41 and 43 logically get engaged in voluntary transfers, and not in

For a similar exception as to movable property, see sections 27 to 29 of the Indian Sale of Goods Act, 1930 (replacing section 108 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and sections 178 and 178A of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, as amended by Act 4 of 1930).

involuntary transfers like auction sales.[1336] Where under a court auction the property was sold and the vendee was directed to hand over the vacant possession to the recovery officer, his claim to be a bonafide purchaser on the basis of sale deed that was not surrendered, would not be accepted and order passed by recovery officer to him to hand over vacant possession of the property would be proper.[1337]

(3) Requirements of the Section

The following conditions are necessary for the application of the section,[1338] namely:

(1) the transferor is the ostensible owner;

(2) he is so by the consent, express or implied, of the real owner;[1339]

(3) the transfer is for consideration;

(4) the transferee has acted in good faith, taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to transfer.[1340]

If any one of these elements is wanting, the transferee is not entitled to the benefit of the section.[1341] The basis of the rule is some representation or act or conduct on the part of the true owner.[1342] The vendor must be the ostensible owner of the property.[1343] If there is no ostensible owner and/with a real owner, the principle under this section has no application.[1344] The principle does not apply in case of gifts and other transfers effected without any monetary consideration.[1345] The question whether the section applies to a given set of facts is a question of law.[1346] This is on the principle that "the proper legal effect of a proved fact is necessarily a question of law".[1347]

In order to obtain the benefit of this section, the transferee must plead it and set out the relevant facts in his pleading.[1348] An alienee from an ostensible owner is protected under section 41, if the alienee can establish that the sale was with the consent, express or implied, of the true owner, and that it was for consideration, and that the alienee had taken reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had the power to make the transfer and had acted in good faith.[1349]

(4) Ostensible Owner

An ostensible owner is one who has all the indicia of ownership without being the real owner.[1350] It must be shown that with the consent of the true owner, the ostensible owner was able to represent himself as the owner of the property to the purchaser for value without notice.[1351] It has been held that the possession of a manager cannot be treated as ostensible ownership with the consent of the real owner;[1352] and this was held to be so even in a case where the manager's name had been entered in the Municipal House Register as the real owner.[1353] A professed agent or manager cannot of course be an ostensible owner;[1354] nor can the occupation of a menial servant constitute ostensible ownership.[1355] But section 41 would apply where the plaintiff allowed his mother to act as manager with the right to alienate for necessity.[1356] If the property vests in an idol, it would not be possible to hold that this trustee or the manager of the idol can set himself up as the owner of the property.[1357] A co-sharer in occupation of a joint family residential property cannot be held to be an ostensible owner.[1358] The conduct of co-sharers in permitting one of them to manage the common property does not by itself raise any estoppel precluding them from asserting their rights.[1359] A displaced person who has been allotted land by the government would be an ostensible owner. Where the property was allotted to a displaced person, but his legal heirs fraudulently obtained allotment at another place and sold the allotted property, the sale would be void, as the legal heirs and the alienee would not be entitled to the protection of section 41.[1360] Similarly, where the state government transferred by sale the land belonging to the Panchayat Samiti in absence of evidence that the transfer was with the consent of the Samiti, express or implied, the plea of protection under section 41 will not be entertained.[1361]

It has been held that a mortgagor is the owner of a limited interest, and not an ostensible owner and, therefore, the purchaser of an equity of redemption is not entitled to the protection of this section against the mortgagee.[1362] This is correct, but the transferee may, it is submitted, in an appropriate case, claim the benefit of the principle behind the section, if he has been led by the conduct of the mortgagee to believe that the property was unencumbered. A donor who has not reserved to himself any power of revocation of the deed of gift cannot be regarded as an ostensible owner even if the deed of gift has been in his possession.[1363] A Mahomedan son and daughter inherited property, but as the son remained in possession of his sister's share as well as his own for 25 years, had all the property entered in the revenue papers in his sole name, and alone executed mortgages of the whole property, he was treated as ostensible owner of his sister's share.[1364] So also, when the other heirs of a Mahomedan, who lived in another village, left the widow in sole possession and allowed her to deal with it as if she was solely entitled.[1365] Again, a widow, who had a half share in a house and allowed her husband's cousin to deal with it as if it were his own, was estopped as she had held him out as ostensible owner.[1366] On the other hand, the manager of a Hindu family who has the power to alienate family property only in case of necessity or for the benefit of the estate, cannot be treated as an ostensible owner.[1367] A vendor coparcener in occupation of portion of ancestral property, does not become "ostensible owner".[1368] Where the transferor and the transferee are closely related as uncle and nephew, the transferee is expected to know the real nature of the transaction, and cannot claim the protection of the section.[1369] Nor can a transferee from a Hindu widow claim the protection of section 41, for a Hindu widow holds in her own right, and not as ostensible owner.[1370]

The term "ostensible owner" would include transferee from State government or Union government. An allottee under the Displaced Persons Compensation and Rehabilitation Act (Act 44 of 1954), can be treated to be an ostensible owner and the government as the real owner.[1371]

A benamidar is an ostensible owner, and if a person purchases from a benamidar, the real owner cannot recover, unless he shows that the purchaser had actual or constructive notice of the real title.[1372] A benami transaction in a sense is not a sham transaction. The essence of a

benami transfer is to give it the appearance of reality, to cloak a fictitious transfer with all the appearance of a genuine one.[1373]

The benamidar before the enactment of Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act, 1988, could not have any right title or interest in the property which the benamidar could convey. A mere declaration by such benamidar in a release deed that he has no right or interest in the property and that he was a mere benamidar of the release, could not operate as a conveyance.[1374]

Principles for determining whether transfer is benami are as under:[1375]

(1) The burden of showing that a transfer is a benami transaction lies on the person who asserts that it is such a transaction;

(2) if it is proved that the purchase money came from a person other than the person in whose favour the property is transferred, the purchase is prima facie assumed to be for the benefit of the person who supplied the purchase money, unless there is evidence to the contrary;

(3) the true character of the transaction is governed by the intention of the person who has contributed the purchase money; and

(4) the question as to what his intention was has to be decided on the basis of the surrounding circumstances, the relationship of the parties, the motive governing their action in bringing about the transaction and their subsequent conduct etc.

In benami transactions, the points to be considered are the motive for the transaction, the custody of the title deeds, the payment of considerations and actual possession of the property in dispute. If, there is a plausible explanation as to why the documents are taken in the name of the other party, and if a person setting out a benami theory is in possession of title deeds, he is in possession of the property, and has made payment of consideration then undoubtedly, it is a benami transaction.[1376]

The Gujarat High Court[1377] relying upon the decision of the apex court in Bhim Singh v Kan Singh held that by making internal arrangements and getting the sale deed executed in favor of the defendant, there was no intention of either of the parties to have benami transactions, or that the defendant should not have any beneficial interest in the property. For almost 18 years, there was no thought of benami transaction, and it is only at the time of filing of the suit that there was a legal brainwave, and an idea was struck for invoking the benami element. There is no substance in this contention.

(5) Application to Mortgages

The principle of the section is not restricted to conveyances, and also applies to mortgages. A mortgagee from an ostensible owner acting in good faith and with reasonable care has frequently been allowed the benefit of the section.[1378]

In the undernoted case;[1379] there was a difference of opinion as to whether an ostensible mortgagee could be treated as an ostensible owner. It is submitted that he is the ostensible owner of the mortgagee's interest. If a purchaser for consideration of that interest, who had acted in good faith and with reasonable care, sought to enforce the mortgage, it seems clear that the mortgagor, who had created that interest, would be estopped.

ILLUSTRATION

A is induced by B to make an colourable conveyance of her house to her granddaughter C who is B's wife. C makes a colourable conveyance to D who is B's brother, 10 years later, D makes a colourable conveyance to B. The names of C and then of D have been registered as owners and B who is in possession, mortgages the house to E. E accepts the mortgage after enquiry with reasonable care, in good faith believing B to be the owner. E obtains a decree for sale of the mortgage and purchases the house. A is barred by section 41 from setting up her title to the house.

(6) Consent

The real owner is not responsible, unless the apparent ownership of the transferor has been permitted or created by him. He creates or permits the appearance of ownership either by express words of consent, or by acts or conduct which imply consent. It is not necessary that he should have been influenced by a fraudulent intention, for his liability rests upon his having put the transferor in a position which enabled him to commit a fraud. This is on the principle that "when one of two innocent persons must suffer from the fraud of a third, he shall suffer who, by his indiscretion, has enabled such third person to commit the fraud".[1380] The same principle was stated in somewhat wider terms by J Ashurst in Lickbarrow v Mason,[1381] > that wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such person to occasion the loss must sustain it.

(1) A husband entered his land in the revenue records in his wife's name and went away on a pilgrimage. Before his departure he had allowed her to mortgage the land. After his departure, she sold the land and the vendee paid off the mortgage. The husband on his return could neither recover the land nor redeem the mortgage.[1382]

(2) A, a Hindu husband, purchased land in the name of his wife, B. The land was then entered in B's name in the revenue records. After A's death B, the widow, mortgaged the land to C who took the mortgage after due enquiry believing in good faith that B was the owner. C obtained a decree for sale on his mortgage and purchased the land. But D was then in possession for D had purchased the land in execution of a money decree against A. C's suit against D for possession was decreed. D was the successor in interest of A who had held out his wife as the ostensible owner and could not defeat the mortgagee who was a transferee in good faith from the ostensible owner.[1383]

On B's death, her son claims to succeed as reversionary heir of A. C is not entitled to the protection of section 41, for his ostensible ownership has not been created by the real owner M, but by the limited owner B.[1384]

The consent must be a free consent as defined in section 14 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and it has been held that it must be an intelligent consent, and not one brought about by a misapprehension of legal rights.[1385] However, a consent based on a mistake of fact had been held to be within the section.[1386] Only those alienees from an ostensible owner are protected, who can establish that the sale in their favour was with the consent, express or implied, of the true owner—and that too, only on proving that it was for consideration, and that they had taken reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had the power to make the transfer, and that they acted in good faith.

A property sold was pre-empted and the pre-emption money was paid by the pre-emptor, but he did not take possession of the property. The prior owners again sold the property to the appellants. On compulsory acquisition of the property, the compensation money was claimed by the respondent, the pre-emptor who was the real owner. The appellants claimed protection under section 41, TP Act, but were denied the same. It was held that the respondent was concededly minor at the time of sales in favour of the appellants. He, therefore, could not be held to have consented expressly or impliedly to the transaction.[1387]

Section 41 does not apply to minors, and a minor's guardian who transfers the property of a minor cannot be treated as an ostensible owner with the consent of the minor,[1388] who, by reason of the disability of infancy, cannot give his consent.[1389] The doctrine of estoppel does not apply to minors,[1390] and still less will the court hold an infant estopped by the acts and omissions of others.[1391]

(1) The owner, a Mohamedan, died leaving a widow and two minor sons. The widow's share was one-eight, but she got herself registered as owner of one-third. She then mortgaged the one-third share to A. A obtained a decree for sale on his mortgage and purchased the properly. A then sold to B. The sons were entitled to recover their proper share from B. A could not be ostensible owner with their consent, express or implied, because they were minors.[1392]

After A's death his widow as guardian of his minor son appointed B as agent to collect the rents. B sold the property to C. The son was not barred by section 41 from asserting his title against C.

This is because—

(i) appointment as agent did not make B the ostensible owner;

(ii) even if B was the ostensible owner he was not so with the consent, express or implied, of the son as the son was then a minor; and

(iii) if C had taken reasonable care, he would have found that B was not in possession of the deeds of title.[1393]

Where the widows of the sons of a deceased mortgagee accepted payment of the debt from the mortgagors and transferred the property to them, the real heirs were not bound, for although the widow's names were entered in the revenue records, they had not consented to the transfer.[1394]

Consent of all owners is necessary when a property which is not partitioned, is transferred by one of the owners. In a case where there has been no evidence, either oral or documentary to establish that there has been some partition, the transferee is not a bona fide purchaser and is not entitled to the benefit of section 41.[1395]

(7) Implied Consent

Implied consent is consent evidenced by conduct. Thus, if the real owner knows that another person is dealing with his property as if it were his own, and acquiesces, his inaction will imply consent.[1396] However, consent must be to ostensible ownership, there is no such consent where co-sharers left the management of the property to one of them, whose name was also shown in the revenue records as owner, as the least inquiry would have disclosed the true facts.[1397] In a case where the purchaser of a tenure allowed his vendor to represent himself to be still the tenant and to continue to pay the rent of the landlord, the purchaser was bound by a decree for sale in execution of a decree for rent against the vendor.[1398] But in a similar case where the vendor paid rent because the landlord refused to receive the rent from the purchaser, J Mukerji held that there is no acquiescence, and that the purchaser was not bound by the landlord's decree.[1399] These cases were decided on the principle to section 41 for the transfer was involuntary, and by operation of the law. But silence will not work an estoppel, unless it is such as to induce a belief that the party keeping silence has no rights.[1400] When purdanashin ladies left the management of their property in the hands of male members of the family who dealt with it without their active concurrence, the Privy Council held that their conduct had not been such as to mislead the mortgagees of the property.[1401] However, in another case where two Mahomedan sisters allowed a spendthrift brother to dissipate their share of the property, the Privy Council held that the brother was the ostensible owner with the implied consent of the sisters, and this was because both the sisters had husbands who understood business.[1402] The inaction or silence of a real owner at a time when he was not conscious of his own rights would not debar him from urging his own claim against a transferor even if he is one for consideration. It is essential that a person giving consent must be aware of his right.[1403] It has been held in some cases[1404] that silence or inactivity can never amount to implied consent, even where the real owner is aware of his rights and of the transfer. This seems doubtful, for considerations of equity would require that a party keeping silent ought to be estopped if such silence induces a belief that he has no rights in the property.[1405] When the real owner, by his conduct, allowed the world at large to believe that he has no right in the property, and infact was not in possession of the property and transactions reflected in the revenue record and in the registered documents fully supported the ostensible title and the possession of the ostensible owner, the purchasers under such circumstances are entitled to protection under section 41.[1406] Where the owner executes a power ofattorney authorizing his attorney to sell the property, which he did for consideration through a registered deed, it was held that a suit for injunction was barred by section 41.[1407]

A mortgage contained so inaccurate a description of the property that a purchaser from the mortgagor did not discover the mortgage on a search of the register. This inaccuracy was held to be due to gross negligence on the part of the mortgagee, which enabled the mortgagor to hold himself out as ostensible owner so that the purchaser acquired a title free from the mortgage.[1408] But in a similar case, it was doubted whether such negligence would amount to implied consent.[1409]

It has been said that the words "with the consent express or implied" govern the word "transfers".[1410] This is erroneous for if the real owner consented to the transfer he would be estopped under section 115 Indian Evidence Act, 1872, irrespective of this section.[1411] Moreover, the section applies when the person, who, with the consent express or implied of the real owner, in the position of an ostensible owner, makes a transfer of which the real owner is unaware.[1412]

(8) Attestation

Attestation does not by itself imply consent.[1413] Attestation estops a man from denying nothing whatsoever, except that he has witnessed the execution of the deed.[1414] It may, of course, be proved that attestation took place in circumstances, which involved knowledge of, or consent to, the transaction;[1415] and it has been said that the ordinary practice in India is to require attestation in token of consent.[1416] But this practice has been condemned by the Privy Council. Lord Buckmaster said:

> If in fact there be a practice, as is suggested from the evidence, that when the consent of parties to a transaction is required, it can be obtained by inducing them by one means or another to attest a signature of the executing parties, the sooner that practice is discontinued the better it will be for the straightforward dealing essential in all business matters.[1417]

(9) Reasonable Care

Reasonable care has been explained to mean such care as an ordinary man of business would take.[1418] Reasonable care is to be expected from every one who claims to have purchased free from a really existing right.[1419] Revenue records are not documents of title, and it is not safe to rely on the entry of the transferor's name in the revenue registers. A transferee who does so and omits to inquire into title is not protected by this section.[1420] This also applies to entries in Municipal and Police registers.[1421] Mere entrusting of an inquiry to a solicitor does not amount to reasonable care.[1422] A discrepancy in the sale certificate between the description of the property by its name and delineation by boundaries ought to put the transferee on guard.[1423]

(10) Possession and Entries in Revenue Records

It may be that on the facts of a case, it is sufficient if the purchaser ascertains that his vendor is in possession and is entered in the revenue records[1424] (illustrations 1 and 2), but this does not dispense with the duty to make the usual inquiry into title (illustration 3).[1425]

(1) Three grandsons were heirs of one-third of an estate, but they took possession of the whole and entered the whole in their names in the revenue registers, and mortgaged the whole property to a mortgagee who took in good faith. The other heirs to one-thirds of the property were barred by section 41 from disputing the mortgage of their share.[1426]

(2) A assigned a lease of town land to B, but A remained in possession and the land was not transferred to the name of B in the Government register. A leased a plot of the land to C who took the lease finding A in possession and the land standing in his name. B was barred by section 41 from asserting his title against C.[1427]

(3) A gave a usufructuary mortgage of land to B in 1867 and B's name was erroneously entered in the revenue records as owner. B, in 1914, mortgaged the land to C, part of the mortgage money being reserved to pay off a prior sub-mortgage of 1902. A sued to redeem the mortgage of 1867. C pleaded that B was in possession, was registered as owner and represented himself to be the owner and that he had not been liable on the mortgage of 1867. If C had made enquiry into title, he would have found that in the mortgage of 1902, B had described himself as mortgagee. C was not entitled to the protection of this section.[1428]

(4) A tahsildar, being forbidden by departmental rules from acquiring land within the limits of his tahsil, purchased land in the name of his minor sons and entered it in their names in the revenue records. The sons afterwards sold and mortgaged the land to a person who acted in good faith and in reliance on the entries in the revenue papers. Nevertheless, the purchasers and mortgagees were not entitled to the protection of this section, as they should not have been satisfied with entries in the revenue records.[1429]

(5) A is the owner of property which is entered in the revenue records in the name of B. B mortgages the property to C who accepts the mortgage relying on the revenue register. If C had made further enquiry, he would have found that A had objected to the entry of the property in B's name and that the property had been left to A by will. C is not protected by this section.[1430]

(11) Inquiries into Title

The transferee must show that he has made the usual inquiry into title; otherwise he is not entitled to the protection of this section.[1431] In this connection, the courts have frequently quoted a well-known passage from Lord Lindley's judgments in Bailey v Barnes:[1432]

> A purchaser of property is under no legal obligation to investigate his vendor's title. But in dealing with real property, as in other matters of business, regard is had to the usual course of business; and a purchaser who wilfully departs from it in order to avoid acquiring a knowledge of his vendor's title is not allowed to derive any advantage from his wilful ignorance of defects which would have come to his knowledge if he had transacted his business in the ordinary way.

(1) A and his brother B formed a joint and undivided Hindu family. A out of self-acquired funds purchased a house and took the conveyance in his own name. After A's death, his representatives sold the house to C. It appears that A had thrown the house into the common stock of the joint family, so that his representatives could only sell a half share. C claimed to have acquired title to the whole under section 41. But as he had made no enquiry into title at all, and had not even seen the main deed of title passing the property to A, he was not entitled to the protection of this section.[1433]

(2) W owned a house in Cawnpore. In 1912 she went on a pilgrimage to Mecca leaving the house in charge, to a relation B. In 1915, B applied to the Municipality that he was not aware of W's whereabouts and nor whether she was dead or alive, and prayed that the house was entered in his name as he was her heir. The application was granted and two years later B sold the house to the defendant who purchased in good faith after inspecting the Municipal register W returned to Cawnpore in 1918 and claimed the house. The defendant was not entitled to the protection of section 41 for he knew that W was the original owner, and if he had carried his enquiries further, he would have ascertained that B had admitted in his application to the Municipality that he did not know whether W was dead or alive and the presumption of death could not be made before the lapse of seven years.[1434]

(3) The male member of a Mahomedan family, who had adopted the Hindu religion in matters of worship, mortgaged family property without consulting the female members of the family. The mortgagee, a pleader, was under the impression that the parties were governed by Hindu law and that the females had no proprietary interest. The males had on previous occasions dealt with the property without the concurrences of the females. Nevertheless, as the mortgagees made no enquiry of the females or of their husbands, and as the former were purdanashin ladies who usually leave the management of property in the hands of male relations, the mortgagee was not protected by section 41.[1435]

(4) Where vendor, being a member of the Scheduled Caste, had no right to alienate the land for a period of twenty years in view of rule 6(8) of the Punjab Package Deal Properties (Disposal) rules, 1976, it was held that the purchaser is not entitled to the protection of section 41 since had he made a reasonable enquiry, he could have ascertained the bar created by rule 6(8) and also would have found out the red ink entry in the jamabandi, which clearly indicated that the land in dispute could not be sold for twenty years.[1436]

The title may be so clear that no particular inquiry is called for. In an Allahabad case,[1437] CJ Stanley said:

> We think that where a person is found in possession of property, and is recorded as owner, and holds the title deeds of the property and deals with a third party in respect of it, there is nothing to suggest a want of good faith in such third party in dealing with him in respect of the property.

However, there may be circumstances which demand further inquiry; and as to these it is not sufficient to assert generally that inquiries should have been made, or that a prudent man would have made inquiry, but some specific circumstances should be pointed out as a starting point of an inquiry, which would have led to some result.[1438] The transferee cannot be held to have acted without reasonable care if there was no clue existing to suggest that the transferor was not the real owner.[1439] It is always necessary to make a particular inquiry if the transferor is the karta of a joint family,[1440] or if the land is in possession of a person other than the transferor.[1441] A person who takes a mortgage from one whom he knows to be the sister's son or grandson of the original owner ought to inquire if there are any collaterals in existence.[1442] When oral transfers were permitted by law in the state of Punjab, inspection of records in the registration office was not sine qua non while granting protection to the alienee under section 41 of the TP Act.[1443]

(12) Property Belonging to Women

Where the real owner is a woman who has allowed her male relations to deal with her property or her share of the property, her right may be defeated by the operation of this section, if the transferee has acted bona fide, and has taken reasonable care to investigate title. Such cases turn on their own facts. In Azima Bibi v Shamalanand,[1444] a case already referred to, the Privy Council held that purdanashin ladies who had left the management of their property to their male relations were not bound by a mortgage of family property executed by them alone. In an Allahabad case,[1445] J Mukerji observed that in Mahomedan families, the names of female heirs are never entered in the revenue records and that:

> if we are to say that Mahomedan sons, simply because their names alone are down in the khewat, are entitled to give a good title to a transferee, and the mother and the sisters shall be precluded from claiming their shares, it would be disastrous indeed.

Similarly, in a Nagpur case,[1446] two Mahomedan brothers and a sister inherited property, and the sister allowed it to be entered in the revenue in the names of the brothers who sold it without consulting the sister; but the court said that "the facts that the transferors were Mahomedans ought to have put the present defendant and his predecessors in interest on enquiry as to whether there was a female heir in addition to the two transferors." In Mubarakunissa v Muhammad Raza,[1447] the property of a deceased Mahomedan was inherited by three grandsons and two daughters. The grandsons took possession of the whole property, entered it in their own names in the register, and two years later mortgaged it. The daughters first heard of the mortgage when the mortgagee brought the property to sale, and although it does not appear that they had husbands to protect their interests, their claim was held barred by section 41. In Macneill & Co v Saroda Sundari,[1448] two Hindu brothers managed the property in which their mother had a third share, and the mother's share was held bound by a permanent lease which they had granted without reference to her. The court distinguished the Privy Council case of Azima Bibi v Shamalanand[1449] on the ground that Hindu women do not as a rule succeed to property by inheritance.

(13) Good Faith

These words mean that the transferee had acted honestly, and in the real belief that the ostensible owner is the real owner. Reasonable care is not enough if there is absence of good faith. A person may act without negligence, but at the same time without honesty. A purchaser may have made a reasonably careful inquiry, but if, after ascertaining the true facts, he chooses to ignore them, he is not protected.[1450] But when a man purchased a possessory title believing in good faith that his vendor was the real owner, and any inquiry that he could have made would only have confirmed him in that belief, the court held he was protected by this section.[1451] The court is slow to believe in the good faith of a transferee who lives in the same village as the real owner, and is acquainted with all the circumstances of his family.[14] Knowledge of the infirmity of the title of the transferor, deprives the transferee of the protection of this section.[1453] Mere misconception of the rights of the transferor will not avail. So, when a person bought property belonging to a female, who had been outcasted for unchastity, believing that her interest was forfeited, he was not protected by this section.[1454] So also, mere good faith is not sufficient. The purchaser must establish that he made reasonable inquiries.[1455] In a Punjab case, the allotment of land to a person (who had migrated from Pakistan to India) in lieu of the land owned in Pakistan, was cancelled by the rehabilitation authorities. Thereafter, the allottee took the land on lease from the rehabilitation authorities and started paying the lease money to them. The land was later auctioned and purchased by the defendants. On application by the allottee, the land was re-auctioned and at the time of re-auction, the allottee competed in the bid with the defendants. When he was unsuccessful in outbidding the defendants, he filed the suit challenging the order cancelling his allotment. However, he had not appealed against the order cancelling the allotment. It was held that the defendants were entitled to the benefit of section 41, and to the principle of estoppel. The conduct of the plaintiff was such that the defendants were led to a belief that the plaintiff consented to the sale of the property, and the purchasers acted in good faith in purchasing it at the time of auction. The plaintiff's participation in the auction, and earlier payment of lease money to the rehabilitation authorities, made defendants believe that no dispute had been left between the plaintiff and the rehabilitation authorities. That conduct of the plaintiff was such that a purchaser at the time of auction could take it in good faith that the plaintiff did not claim the property.[1456] The Patna High Court has held that if the transaction is a sham one, the section cannot apply, since the transferee would then have knowledge of reality.[1457]

Plaintiff vendor alleged that sale deed was as security for loan advanced by defendant. Plaintiff continued in possession despite the sale deed. The defendant admitted during cross-examination, that on many occasions he has entered into a sale transaction of the land to keep it as security. Therefore, it was held that sale deed was security for loan advanced, and not an outright sale.[1458]

Where the transferee fails to prove that he acted in good faith taking reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had the power to transfer the land he is not entitled to protection of section 41.[1459] Where the property was jointly owned by the three co-owners and the property was undivided, without a partition, and one of them transferred the property but the transferee had neither ascertained from any other person whether the transferor had the capacity to transfer the property, he cannot claim the benefit of being a bonafide transferee without notice and no protection under section 41 would be available to him.[1460] Similarly, a transferee pendente lite cannot seek the protection of section 41 as he cannot be considered a bonafide transferee without notice.[1461]

In a suit for declaration, a co-sharer with vendor could not be said to be the owner of share of his sister by way of adverse possession. Where the property was owned by the brother and a sister of their respective shares, and the plaintiff had not ousted the sister from the suit land and the vendor had also not abandoned her share in suit property, the subsequent vendees having made inquiry from revenue records and on satisfying themselves that as per revenue record vendor was owner of half of the share in the suit property had purchased the same, in such circumstances the subsequent vendees would be entitled to protection under section 41 being bonafide purchasers for consideration.[1462]

Where the transferee knew it fully well that property belonged to "A" and the transferor, the grandson of A had no title over the property, a consent letter executed by A would neither convey any title nor create any interest in favour of the transferee in any land as the transferor had no right to sell the land and the transferee had knowledge of it. The transfer of property through sale would thus be not proper.[1463] In determining whether the relationship was based on trust or confidence, then the court shall consider the factual context.[1464]

When section 41 has no application

In case of failure to mention in the pleadings that the transferor was an ostensible owner with consent of the original owner of the land, the claim of the plaintiff for right, title in land on account of transfer of land by a person other than owner to him would not be accepted. Section 41 has no application where transfer is held invalid under sections 19 and 24 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation Act, (Act 44 of 1954)), as no estoppel can be pleaded against provisions of a statute. It would be within right of subsequent purchasers to challenge order of cancellation on merits, but sale in their favour cannot be protected under section 41 of the Transfer of Property Act. The subsequent vendee can only claim refund or damages from his vendor. Section 41 cannot be applied for the benefit of a transferee pendente lite as he would not be a bonafide transferee without notice.[1465]

Limitation in a Suit for Cancellation of the Sale Deed

Where right from the execution of the sale deed and whenever the transferee had tried to get the mutation done in his name the co-owners had been objecting to it and ultimately an order was passed by the court that gave them the cause of action, a suit filed within three years from this order would be within the period of limitation.[1466]

(14) Partial Interest

The section also applies to cases where the transferor has actually some interest and the appearance of an interest greater than he really has. In one case, the plaintiff granted a mortgage by conditional sale by two contemporaneous deeds, one a sale and the other an agreement of reconveyance. The plaintiff retained the agreement of reconveyance, and the mortgagee who was in possession sold the land after the lapse of 42 years to the defendant, who on inspection of the sale deed believed the mortgagee to be a vendee. The plaintiff sued to redeem the defendant, but section 41 was held to bar the suit.[1467] It may be observed, in passing, that such a case could not occur since the amendment of section 58(c) which requires a condition of reconveyance in a mortgage to be engrossed in the same deed. Cases in which the transferor is a mortgagor or one of several heirs have already been cited.

(15) Onus of Proof

The section is an exception to the general rule that no person can dispose of an interest in property that is not vested in him and, therefore, the onus is, in the first place, on the transferee to show that the transferor was the ostensible owner, and that he (the transferee) had acted in good faith, and with reasonable care.[1468] The person who alleges that the property conveyed to another really belongs to him must prove his allegation.[1469]

This burden of proving a transaction to be a benami one is on the person who alleges the same to be benami, because the apparent state of affairs must be taken to be real, unless the contrary is proved. In a suit for declaration of title to the suit property on a plea that the defendant was a benamidar of the plaintiff, the initial burden is on the plaintiff to prove the benami nature of the transaction.[1470] The burden, however, does not continuously rest in one place, but may shift to the other side. Where it is not possible to obtain evidence which conclusively establishes or rebuts the allegation, the case must be dealt with on reasonable probabilities and legal inferences arising from proved or admitted facts.[1471] The decision must be based on legal grounds, and not mere suspicion.[1472]

The onus is then shifted on the party seeking to defeat the transferee's title to show that there was something to call attention and invoke inquiry. This is because the real owner having created the appearance of title in another person, it is incumbent on him, or on those who derive title from him to show something which amounts to constructive notice of the real title, some specific circumstance as the starting point of an inquiry which would have led to the discovery of it.[1473] The same rule was applied in a case where the ostensible owner had a lien on the property.[1474] If notice by the purchaser is pleaded by the real owner, the burden is on him (the real owner) to prove such notice. He must show that the purchaser had direct notice, or something which amounts to constructive notice of the real title, or that there existed circumstance which ought to have put the purchaser on an inquiry which, if prosecuted properly, could have led to discovery of the real title.[1475]

To substantiate a case of benami, several factors have to be taken into consideration by the court. The relevant factors are:

(a) the consideration;

(b) possession and enjoyment of the property;

(c) possession of the title deeds;

(d) motive, and

(e) mutation in the public records.

Further, if the benamidar and the real owner were related as wife and husband, the payment of consideration may not be decisive, for, it is most likely that the husband intended to benefit the wife.[1476]

(16) Subsequent Transferee

The section is not limited to the immediate purchaser from an ostensible owner, but extends to subsequent purchasers also. Even if the immediate purchaser had notice, yet the ultimate purchaser, if he purchases bona fide and with reasonable care, is protected.[1477] A is the real owner of property and leaves it in the possession of B as ostensible owner. B sells it to C, who has constructive notice of A's title. C then sells it to D, who is not aware of the fact which gave C constructive notice. D buys from C in good faith and after inquiry with reasonable care, D is entitled to the protection of the section. Where a sale deed and power of attorney in favour of the defendant purchaser was duly registered and the purchaser had also created the third party rights by subsequent sale of suit property by virtue of the power of attorney and sale deed, it was held that such third party's rights have to be protected and the plaintiff having failed to prove loan transaction would not be entitled to get the relief of suit for title and cancellation of power of attorney and sale deed.[1478]

(17) Section 52 Excludes section 41

In a case decided by Allahabad High Court the property was in the possession of three illegitimate sons whose names were entered in the revenue records. The rightful heir filed a suit to recover possession and obtained a decree. But a few days after he filed the suit, the illegitimate sons mortgaged the property, and the mortgagee, relying on their ostensible ownership, claimed that the rightful heir was bound by the mortgage. The mortgagors whose names were entered in the revenue records and who were in possession were no doubt ostensible owners; but as the real owners had filed a suit against them, it is clear that they were not, on the date on which the mortgage was made, ostensible owners with their consent, express or implied. In Ishwar Das v Bir Singh,[1479] the property in dispute initially belonged to A, who gifted some landed property to W, but pursuant to the suit filed by his sons, it was found that the gifted land also included the ancestral property and W was entitled to only a 1/6 of the same and not 1/3. During the pendency of the suit regarding the ancestral property, B purchased the part of property of W; claimed himself as a bonafide purchaser; and prayed for a decree for declaration and protection of his joint possession to the extent of 1/3 of the ancestral property. The court held that B was not entitled to the protection contemplated under section 41 of the Act for the reasons that section 52 of the Act has an overriding effect on section 41 and the person having purchased property during the pendency of the suit is not entitled to the protection of section 41 of the Act. The doctrine of lis pendens under section 52, therefore, excludes the doctrine of ostensible ownership under this section.[1480]

(18) Registration Act, 1908

Section 41 should not be read so as to conflict with section 47 of the Registration Act, 1908. A sells his property to B, and before the sale deed is registered sells it again by a registered sale deed to C. B's sale deed, though registered later, has priority. C cannot claim that A was the ostensible owner with the consent of B so as to bar B's claim under section 41.[1481]

(19) Code of Civil Procedure 1908

A transferee from a certified purchaser at a court sale is, by virtue of section 66 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, protected from a suit on the ground that his transferor was a benamidar.[1482]

(20) Reliance on Recitals

The inaccuracy in the recitals describing the property cannot whittle down the effect of clear recitals in the documents about the property to be sold thereby.[1483]

(21) Prohibition of Benami Transactions

The Parliament has enacted the Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act, 1988 prohibiting benami transactions under section 3(1), and making them punishable under section 3(3). The prohibition does not, however, apply to the purchase of property by any person in the name of his wife or unmarried daughters and it shall be presumed, unless the contrary is proved, that the said property had been purchased for the benefit of the wife or the unmarried daughters. Benami transaction is defined under section 2(1) so as to mean any transaction in which property is transferred to one person for consideration paid or provided by another person. Nothing in the Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act shall affect the provisions of section 53 of the TP Act as laid down in section 6. The Supreme Court has held that the Benami Transaction (Prohibition) Act is a piece of prohibitory legislation, and it prohibits benami transactions subject to stated exceptions and makes such transactions punishable, and also prohibits the right to defences against recovery of benami transactions as defined in section 2(a) of that Act.[1484]

42. Transfer by person having authority to revoke former transfer.—Where a person transfers any immovable property, reserving power to revoke the transfer, and subsequently transfers the property for consideration to another transferee, such transfer operates in favour of such transferee (subject to any condition attached to the exercise of the power) as a revocation of the former transfer to the extent of the power.

ILLUSTRATION

A lets a house to B, and reserves power to revoke the lease if, in the opinion of a specified surveyor, B should make a use of it detrimental to its value. Afterwards A, thinking that such a use has been made, lets the house to C. This operates as a revocation of B's lease subject to the opinion of the surveyor as to B's use of the house having been detrimental to its value.

Synopsis

(1) Principle..... 249

(1) Principle

The principle of the section is that if a person has a right to transfer property, after exercising a right to revoke a previous transfer, a transfer of such property by him will imply an exercise of the right of revocation. The illustration shows that if the power of revocation is subject to a condition, the transfer is subject to the same condition.[1485]

If the first transfer is a gift and is revocable at the will of the donor, it is void under section 126 of TP Act.

43. Transfer by unauthorised person who subsequently acquires interest in property transferred.—Where a person fraudulently or[1486] erroneously represents that he is authorised to transfer certain immovable property and professes to transfer such property for consideration, such transfer shall, at the option of the transferee, operate on any interest which the transferor may acquire in such property at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists.

Nothing in this section shall impair the right of transferees in good faith for consideration without notice of the existence of the said option.

(1) Amendment

The words "fraudulently or" were inserted by the amending Act 20 of 1929.

(2) Scope

The Supreme Court in Jumma Masjid Mercara v Kodimaniandra Deviah[1487] has held that section 43 embodies a rule of estoppel, and enacts that a person who makes a representation shall not be heard to allege the contrary as against a person who acts on such representation. It is immaterial whether the transferor acts bona fide or fraudulently in making the representation. It is only material to find out whether in fact the transferee has been misled, where the transferee knows as a fact that the transferor does not possess the title which he represents he has, then he cannot be said to have acted on it when taking a transfer. Section 43 would then have no application, and the transfer will fail.

(3) Feeding the Estoppel and the English Law

By the English law of estoppel, "where a grantor has purported to grant an interest in land which he did not at the time possess, but subsequently acquires, the benefit of his subsequent acquisition, goes automatically to the earlier grantee, or as it is usually expressed, feeds the estoppel".[1488] The principle is based partly on the common law doctrine of estoppel by deed, and partly on the equitable doctrine that a man who has promised more than he can perform must make good his contract when he acquires the power of performance.

Under the common law doctrine, if a man sells property which does not belong to him and afterwards acquires such title as enables him either wholly or partially to perform his contract, he is bound to do so; and the subsequently acquired estate feeds the estoppel which arises out of the vendor's covenants for title, express or implied. In Tilakdhari Lal v Khedan Lal,[1489] Lord Buckmaster stated the rule of estoppel by deed as follows—

> If a man who has no title whatever to property grants it by a conveyance which in form would carry the legal estate, and he subsequently acquires an interest sufficient to satisfy the grant, the estate, instantly passes.

The words "the estate instantly passes" are important, for under the common law rule the estate passed without any further act of the transferor, and the estoppel prevailed even against a purchaser for value. The application of the common law rule is complicated by many curious technicalities,[1490] and it is fortunate that it does not apply in India.[1491]

The law of estoppel in the case of real property is different from the law of estoppel as between persons. It is the law which operates where a grantee of land has had a conveyance of the whole interest in land from a grantor who himself at that time had only a partial interest. The former then has a right when the grantor gets the entire interest in the land, to say as against all the world that, that interest had passed to him. It does not then depend upon the mere representation by the grantor that he had the whole interest. The estate feeds the estoppel and, therefore, becomes an interest. From the moment, therefore, the transfer commences to operate on the interest acquired by the transferor in the property, it is no longer in the region of estoppel, but becomes an interest and the commencement of that interest is from the date when the transferor had acquired interest in the property.[1492]

(4) Indian Law and the Specific Relief Act

The equitable doctrine is an application of the equity enunciated in Holroyd v Marshall,[1493] Collyer v Issacs[1494] and Tailby v Official Receiver,[1495] and which regards that as done, which ought to be done. Under the English equity, as soon as the property is afterwards acquired, an equitable estate in it passes to the transferee. Under the Indian system, as soon as the property is afterwards acquired, no estate passes (section 54), but an obligation is annexed to the property (section 40), and the transferor becomes trustee of it for the transferee. This equitable rule is enacted in section 13(l)(a) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, which is as follows:

Where a person contracts to sell or lets certain immovable property having no title or only an imperfect title, the purchaser or lessee (subject to the other provisions of this Chapter), has the following rights, namely: if the vendor or lessor has subsequently to the contract acquired any interest in the property, the purchaser or lessee may compel him to make good the contract out of such interest.

Section 43 follows the common law rule of estoppel. The rule is that if a man, who has no title whatever to the property, grants it by a conveyance which in form carries the legal estate, and he subsequently acquires an interest sufficient to satisfy the grant, the estate instantly passes. Thus, where a person having a partial interest in certain property passes a larger interest, and subsequently acquires that interest, the section applies and the transferee is entitled to the interest acquired by the transferor.[1496] Where a person having no title represents that he has a present and transferable title and the transferee (acting on it) takes a transfer, and the transferor subsequently acquires the property, the section applies.[1497] However, it departs from the common law rule in two respects. For (1) the estate does not pass instantly, but only at the option of the transferee; and (2) the transferee may be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice. As no estoppel can be pleaded contrary to the provisions of a statute, this "rule of feeding the estoppel" shall apply only in absence thereof, according to which 'where a grantor has purported to grant an interest in land which he did not at the time possess, but subsequently acquires, the benefit of his subsequent acquisition, goes automatically to the earlier grantee, or as it is usually expressed, feeds the estoppel".[1498]

Section 43 follows the equitable rule in that, until the option is exercised, it treats the transferee as the beneficiary of a trust who may be defeated by a purchaser for value without notice. However, it departs from the equitable rule in that it does not require the transfer to be effected by a further conveyance. The word "deliver" in the illustration is significant of the meaning of the section. If the transferee were enforcing the contract under section 13(l)(a) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963, the transferor would be required to execute a further conveyance. But under section 43 the exercise of the option, or the mere requisition of the transferee is sufficient to bring the subsequent interest within the scope of the original transfer. The section is a species of estoppel, and cannot be availed of by a person who knowing the facts was not misled. Questions of knowledge and belief are material and the other side must be given a chance of raising its defence, if and when the section is pleaded.[1499]

Comparison between (13)(l)(a) of the Specific Relief Act, 1963—then section 18(a) of the old Act—and section 43, has been shown in Silla Chandra Sekharam v Ramchandra Sahu.[1500]

(5) Sections 41 and 43 Compared

There is a substantial difference between the ambits of sections 41 and 43. Section 41 provides that a transfer by an ostensible owner cannot be avoided on the ground that the transferor was not authorised to make it, and the rule is made subject to an express provision that the transferee should take reasonable care to ascertain that the transferor had power to make the transfer, and to act in good faith before he can claim its benefit. On the other hand, section 43 enables a transferee to whom a transferor has made a fraudulent or erroneous representation to lay hold, at his option, of any interest which the transferor may subsequently acquire in the property, provided by doing so he does not adversely affect the right of any subsequent purchaser for value without notice.[1501] The provisions of sections 41 and 43 logically get engaged in voluntary transfers, and not in involuntary transfers, like auction sales.[1502]

(6) Principle Applied to Hindu Conveyances

The principle of the section has been held to apply to Hindu conveyances and to transactions before 1872, when the Indian Evidence Act enacted the equitable rule of estoppel in section 115.[1503]

(7) Fraudulently or Erroneously Represents

The English common law doctrine of estoppel by deed was extended by equity to estoppel by representation. This extension dates from Pickard v Sears.[1504] The rule in India is the rule as extended by equity, and it is enacted in section 115 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and is explained in the leading case of Sarat Chunder v Gopal Chunder.[1505] As the equitable doctrine of estoppel requires a man to make his representation good, the words "fraudulently or erroneously represents" have been said to make estoppel the foundation of the section, and in the absence of such representation, the section does not apply.[1506] Thus the sine qua non for application of section 43 is that at the initial stage the person should have fraudulently or erroneously represented that he is authorized to transfer certain immovable property or professes to transfer such property for consideration. Only if this pre-condition is satisfied, the question of option of the transferee arises in case the transferor acquires any interest in the property at any time during which the contract of transfer subsists.[1507] The representation need not be intentionally false.[1508] It requires an erroneous misrepresentation or a fraudulent representation,[1509] and whether it is erroneous is a question of fact.[1510] It need not be in a particular form. It can be by word of mouth or by a document.[1511] Where a vendor sold as agent of a Hindu widow and then became her heir, the section did not operate, for he had sold as agent and had made no erroneous representation.[1512] However, when a Mahomedan mortgaged his wife's property purporting to act on a power of attorney which was not proved, the share which he inherited at her death was liable for the mortgage.[1513] A ghatwal mortgaged land which he held on restricted tenure alleging it to be his jagheer, and subsequently got a mokarari lease of it. He was estopped from pleading his subsequent title, and the mortgagee got the benefit of the mokarari interest.[1514] Two brothers mortgaged their interest in a tank in which their cousin had a half share. They subsequently acquired their cousin's share by inheritance, but the mortgagee who had got a decree for sale on his mortgage, purchased the property and sold it to the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not get the benefit of the cousin's share as there had been no representation, erroneous or fraudulent.[1515] But when the head of a joint Hindu family mortgaged joint family property representing that he had a right to do so, he was bound to make good his representation to the extent of a share which came to him afterwards on partition.[1516]

Again, the father of a joint family consisting of himself and two sons sold family property representing that it was his self-acquisition. The vendee sued for possession and pending the suit one of the sons died. The vendee got the benefit of this accession to the father's estate, and was awarded half of the property.[1517] So also, where a member of a joint Hindu family mortgaged his undivided share in the joint property in favour of another person, alleging that he was separate from the rest of the members, and thereafter there was a partition giving such member certain property, it was held that the mortgage lien would be transferred to the property which fell to such member's share.[1518] No fraudulent or erroneous representation was found when the sale showed that transferor had 8 anna share in the land and he sold only that much.[1519]

ILLUSTRATION

A and B were two brothers and effected a partition at which the equity of redemption of a mortgage shop was allotted to A. In 1903, A had disappeared and B sold the equity of redemption to C, erroneously representing that it was ancestral property to which he was solely entitled. In 1924, C sued to redeem the mortgage of the shop and was met with the defence that he got no title from B as A was alive in 1903 and the equity of redemption belonged to him. It was proved that A died in 1914 leaving no heir except B. C was entitled to redeem as he was owner of the equity of redemption by virtue of this section.[1520]

A lady who had already executed a settlement of the suit property in favour of V on certain conditions cancelled it (though no such power had been reserved), and executed a sale-deed in favour of G. Thereafter, the settlement lapsed because of non-fulfilment of the conditions of V. The purchaser from G filed a suit for declaration of title and possession. It was held that there was an erroneous representation by the lady to G that the lady was authorised to transfer the property. As the lady (by failure of the settlement) subsequently acquired an interest in the property, the transferee was entitled to that interest, as he had not rescinded the transfer which was still subsisting. The case squarely fell within the terms of the section.[1521] Similarly, a Muslim woman transferring property that she purchased with the consideration received after relinquishing her spes successionis would not be allowed to claim her ineligibility to transfer the same and the transfer would be valid.[1522] Where the son sold the property belonging to his mother under a registered deed on her behalf and delivered the possession to B despite the fact that he was not authorized to make the said transfer, it was held that the transferee was entitled to benefit of section 43, containing the rule of estoppel, as he had acted on the representation made by the son and paid consideration.[1523]

Where the mother sold property in which her minor son had half share and the son successfully challenged the alienation of his share and obtained a decree but died thereafter, it was held that though the mother inherited the property of her son on his death, the vendee could not invoke section 43 in respect of his share as the original contra did not subsist in view of the decree which was obtained by the son.[1524] Where a person mortgages property which he has no right to mortgage and the property subsequently becomes vested in him, the mortgage will operate against him under the provisions of this section.[1525] When a lessor erroneously represents that he is authorized to lease a property and grants a lease of it, and afterwards acquires that property, the lessee is entitled to have the property from the lessor.[1526] Where a partner sells the property of the firm in his own right and subsequently on the dissolution of the firm is allotted the same property, this section would apply.[1527] Where the holder of "sir" land ("sirdar") proposes to acquire bhumidhari rights by depositing money, he does not acquire title immediately on deposit of money, but acquires it only when the bhumidhari certificate is issued. Nevertheless, if he effects the sale after such deposit, then section 43 applies, if he makes an erroneous representation that he was authorised to sell. In such a case, the transfer cannot be challenged by the son of the transferor.[1528] In a case where one of the daughters of the original owner was in exclusive possession of the property which she purported to transfer; the Supreme Court held that the transferee was entitled to the property under section 43, which substantially satisfies the equitable principle of feeding the grant by estoppel. The partition, between the daughters could be presumed to have been made with the consent of the other. In any case, after the death of her sister, the last limited owner, (transferor) got exclusive possession of the entire estate, and section 43 would apply.[1529]

(1) A Hindu wife executed a mortgage of her husband's property as if it belonged to her, five years after he had disappeared. The mortgage was invalid as the presumption of the death does not arise until seven years. But when the mortgagee filed a suit more than seven years later, the mortgage was valid, as she then had acquired a widow's estate.[1530]

(2) A, B and C owned a property in equal shares. A and B leased the whole property to B as if they were entitled to it to the exclusion of C. C died and bequeathed his share to A and B. D's title as lessee of the whole property was perfected.[1531]

(3) A obtained property from B by way of exchange. At the time of the exchange B had only a half share although he professed to transfer the whole. When B subsequently purchased the remaining half it was available to perfect A's title.[1532]

(4) A seller, who had no Bhumidhar rights on date of sale made an erroneous statement in sale deed to the effect that he had these rights. After 13 years, he acquired the Bhumidar rights.

It was held that such rights would enure to the transferee as sale deed remained intact for the said period.[1533]

Transferee is not entitled to protection under section 43 when there has been no pleading that there was fradulent or erroneous representation by transferor consequent to which no issue was framed.[1534] One must make a specific pleading regarding fradulent or erroneous representation made. not the landlord and hence, was never misled by any false or erroneous representation, it was held that section 43 has no application.[1535]

(8) Transferee Acts on the Representation

The section does not expressly provide that the transferee should have been misled by the erroneous representation, for, as has been said, there is no estoppel by a false statement when the truth is known to both parties.[1536] The right of a transferee arises from the fact that he has not got what he has paid for. If he knew that he was buying a defective title, he has paid less, and got what he bargained for.[1537] That is also the position at common law, where it is well-settled that no estoppel can arise where the true position is apparent in the document itself.[1538] If both parties are aware of the title of the transferor, section 43 does not apply.[1539] A transferee is entitled to the benefit of section 43 if he believed in the representation made by the vendor and was not aware of the true interest of the vendor, with reference to the property.[1540] Where it was found that there were no fraudulent or erroneous representations and the parties were fully aware of the on-going proceeding in revenue court, merely because the land reverted to the vendor making him the owner, would not entitle the vendee, the protection of section 43.[1541]

Where one brother having only the leasehold right in his favour sold property in favour of another brother who had knowledge of the fact that he does not have absolute ownership but only the leasehold rights, he cannot later claim the benefit of section 43 and pray that newly acquired absolute rights be transferred in his favour.[1542] In Mulraj v Indar Singh,[1543] it was observed that the word "represents" used in section 43 clearly shows that the transferee must have acted on the representation, and it has been so held in numerous decisions.[1544] It is submitted that the same conclusion can perhaps be based on the words "fraudulently or erroneously represents"; a false statement known to be so can certainly not be fraudulent, and it is difficult to describe it even as an erroneous representation. In two cases, however, the contrary view has been taken. In Parma Nand v Champa Lal,[1545] a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court overruled Mulraj v Indar Singh,[1546] and Jagernath v

Dhanpati,[1547] and held that a transferee of a certain shop, who knew that the transferor was only the owner of a half-share in the shop, was entitled under section 43 to the other half-share when the transferor became entitled to it. The court held that there was nothing in section 43 which excluded its operation where the transferee was aware of the true position. A similar view has also been expressed by the Andhra Pradesh High Court.[1548] Both these judgments held that the knowledge of the transferee is immaterial, unless it is found that the transfer was illegal or collusively entered into to defeat the provisions of law or is opposed to public policy. It is submitted, with respect, that both these judgments are erroneous. In any event, it is difficult in practice to conceive of many cases where a transferee would, with the knowledge of the true position, enter into such a transaction except to circumvent a provision of the law, or for some other purpose opposed to public policy.[1549]

A mortgaged to B a half-share in family property in which he was entitled only to a third share. Subsequently, A's father died and A became owner of a half-share. But as B knew that A had only a third share he could only enforce his mortgage against a third share.[1550]

Similarly, when a mortgagee of land attached to a deshgat watan knew that the mortgagor could only convey a life interest, the subsequent enlargement of the mortgagor's interest did not enure for his benefit, for he only took the estate the mortgagor was capable of conveying at the date of the mortgage.[1551] Where evidence regarding the representation is vague and the facts are known to the purchasers, section 43 cannot apply.[1552] Where the transferee knows as a fact that the transferor does not possess the title which he represents he has, then he cannot be said to have acted on it when taking a transfer, and in such a situation section 43 would have no application.[1553]

It is no defence to the person estopped to plead that the transferee made no proper inquiry.[1554]

Section 43 does not, like section 41, impose upon the transferee the duty of taking reasonable care.[1555] No duty is cast on the vendee to make any inquiry and notice to the vendee of encumbrance does not bar the application of the section.[1556] In Bloomenthal v Ford,[1557] Lord Halsbury said that a person who has made a mis-statement of fact that has been acted upon has no right to say "I told you so and so you ought not to have believed me. You were too great a fool. I had a right to mislead you because you were too great a fool."

(9) For Consideration

The section does not apply if the transfer is not for consideration;[1558] it does not apply to a transaction of gift.[1559]

(10) Invalid Transfer

In order to get the benefit of the section, two conditions which must be satisfied are—(1) the contract of transfer was made by a person who was competent to contract; and (2) the contract would be subsisting at the time when a claim for recovery of the property is made.[1560] The section will not apply if the transfer is invalid as being forbidden by law or contrary to public policy. This follows from the principle that there can be no estoppel against an Act of the legislature and when considerations of public interest are involved.[1561] Thus, if a minor transfers, the section has no application.[1562] Sale by a lunatic being void from its inception, the purchaser cannot get any relief under section 43.[1563] So also, when the transfer required the previous permission of the Collector, and no such permission was obtained.[1564] Where the settlement was invalid and inoperative not on account of any fraudulent or erroneous representation, but on account of the subsisting lease in respect of the land and as the landlord could not superimpose a second lease in respect of the tenanted property, it was held that no interest could be created under the subsequent document, and, therefore, there could be no question of feeding the estoppel.[1565] In Barrow's case[1566] VC Bacon said that:

> estoppel only applies to a contract inter partes, and it is not competent to for the parties to estop themselves or anybody else in the face of an Act of Parliament.

No equities can arise out of a transaction that is forbidden on grounds of public policy.[1567] In Annada v Gour Mohan,[1568] J Mookerjee said that the principle of feeding the estoppel has no application when the contract of assignment refers to property which has been expressly rendered inalienable by the legislature. The interest of a Hindu reversioner is a spes successionis, and is not transferable. An agreement to transfer, or a transfer of, such an interest does not become effective when the succession opens out.[1569] However, in two cases the Madras High Court has held that if the reversioner transfers, not his reversionary interest, but the land in praesenti as if he were absolutely entitled, section 43 will apply to validate the transfer when he succeeds to the property.[1570] This distinction seems to have the support of the illustration to the section where A transfers field Z as to which he has only an expectancy of succession. In another case,[1571] the Madras High Court has dissented on the ground that such a distinction would defeat the provisions of section 6(a). The Allahabad High Court, however, has followed the earlier case decided by Madras High Court holding that the illustration to section 41 is not repugnant to section 6 of the TP Act.[1572]

The provisions of sections 6(1) and section 43 "operate on different fields, and under different conditions, and there is no ground for reading a conflict between them or for cutting down the ambit of one by reference to the other; both of them can be given full effect on their own terms, in their respective spheres."[1573]

A case decided by Rajasthan High Court, though it does not purport to be a case on section 41, is of interest. It holds that where a landlord is given possession by mistake of court (in disregard of a stay order staying execution of the eviction decree passed, against the tenant), the landlord's possession is illegal, and any new tenant inducted by the landlord cannot claim restitution as a bona fide transferee.[1574]

It was held by Supreme Court in Jumma Masjid v Kodimaniandra Deviah,[1575] affirming a Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court, that the section applies to all transfers which fulfil the conditions prescribed therein, "and it makes no difference in its application, whether the defect of title in the transferor arises by reason of his having no interest whatsoever in the property, or of his interest therein being that of an expectant heir".[1576] In that case, the Supreme Court held that even where a person having a mere spes successionis represents that he is the owner thereof, and transfers it to another, he is precluded from questioning the validity of the transfer, if he later on succeeds thereto, or acquires an interest therein. In Delhi Development Authority v Ravindra Mohan Aggarwal,[1577] a plot of land within the green belt zone was auctioned. The vice-chairman of Delhi Development Authority accepted the bid. Subsequently, the zonal plan was changed, and the said plot of land was converted for residential purpose. The Supreme Court held that since the initial auction was bad in law, and since there cannot be any estoppel against statute, the subsequent conversion would not entitle the bidder, the protection of section 43.

The section does not apply to transfers forbidden by law on grounds of public policy. Thus a mortgage by a proprietor disqualified under the Jhansi Encumbered Estates Act, 1882, cannot be enforced after the disqualification has been removed.[1578] A purchaser of service inam land acquires no title after the land has been enfranchised.[1579] The court cannot under the guise of section 43 uphold a transfer forbidden by law, but if the restriction on alienation is not an absolute restriction founded on considerations of public policy, but is only imposed by agreement, grant, or decree of court, the section will apply.[1580]

A mortgage by a judgment debtor of property which is the subject of execution by the Collector is absolutely void, and is not effective against any residue that might be left after the Collector's regime has ended.[1581] On the other hand, a mortgage by an undischarged insolvent becomes effective if the property revests in the insolvent after his discharge.[1582]

Where grant is subjected to statutory restrictions which bar alienation of the granted land, the transferee would not get a valid title to the land by invoking the doctrine of feeding the estoppel, or by virtue of section 43.[1583] If a particular piece of property has been declared by a statute to be specifically inalienable such as Bhumidar land, section 43 does not apply.[1584]
